In conversations with passerby in the Student Union and Campus Center in the past week, I have been presently surprised at the level of interest in the question of fighting Lombardi's proposed campus reorganization. Many, much like myself, are only marginally or else entirely uninvolved in campus politics, and have a dim recollection of a Diversity Commission but no knowledge of any proposed diversity plan. Many have some vague knowledge of the somewhat fascist policies of Vice Chancellor Gargano but make no connection between his call for "total cooperation to move the campus forward," his zero-tolerance policy, and authoring of the Student Affairs section of the Proposed Action Plan to Improve Diversity. This is due in part to the sneaky timing of its release over spring break and in part to the busy schedule that keeps so many of us from dedicating time to our extracurricular causes.

Cultivation of the student body's sentiment of betrayal and its consequent indignation must allow an articulate channeling of our collective energies to effectuate the conditions and changes that we desire.

Either way, interest has been surprisingly high; a fact at least partially reflected by the good attendance last week and at today's GEO march. Cultivation of the student body's sentiment of betrayal and its consequent indignation must allow an articulate channeling of our collective energies to effectuate the conditions and changes that we desire on our campus. This means that strong leadership within student groups and RSOs is now more important than ever, as we seem to have been pressed very quickly and quietly into a battle concerning the most radical restructuring of the University in more than thirty years.

Active resistance to this point has been led mostly by Take Back UMass and individuals with the SGA, GSS, and ALANA. Surprisingly absent has been any sort of participation from political clubs or other special interest groups concerned with their future here. I call upon the leadership of these bodies to get out and make their presence felt; today's march would be an opportune time to begin advocating and networking with other active groups.

Perhaps my tone should be less optimistic. After all, what does a powerful administration care about a bunch of pesky students soon to be graduated and on their way? Lombardi has a propensity to pay rhetorically-savvy lip service to student petitions without actually intending to act upon them. Besides, so many of us are busy trying to graduate. New campus policies, accompanied by a strengthened police force discourage any action we might take.

All of this is and more is true. For the skeptical, I ask merely that they review the history of our university. Many of the services and liberties we enjoy today were gained from student action against notoriously resistant administrations like the current one — and we are talking about as recently as the last half-decade. Let us continue working and uniting as students for our common cause; our education literally depends on it.

The death of a legal superhero

Matthew Burke

Let's face it folks, the world needs lawyers. Love 'em or hate 'em, they are in demand. I personally like lawyers, because some do great work and are exemplary public servants.

Johnnie Cochran Jr. was the greatest lawyer ever. Cochran, of O.J. Simpson trial fame, died Tuesday in his Los Angeles home due to a brain tumor, thus ending a prolific chapter in American legal history.

No name has ever instilled as much fear into the eyes of the police, the District Attorney's, and the legal establishment. He had the eloquence and presence of Matlock and the passion of Perry Mason. When those two television lawyers are added together, you are left with one pretty damn smooth lawyer, or simply Johnnie Cochran Jr. He was some sort of legal superhero.

You knew that if you unleashed Johnny, he wouldn't play nice, and his client would either walk or be brought to the table to collect a big settlement check — which meant a big check for Johnnie as well.

He loved both the win and the money. Some say he would sometimes win controversially, often using the "race card" as a defense. Some call him a warrior of injustice for blacks everywhere, and some see him as the man who freed a killer.

Whatever you think of the man personally, Cochran deserves to be remembered as the best there ever was at what he did. He was the Hank Aaron of the courtroom. The Muhammed Ali of bringing cities to their knees in litigation, and the King of one-liners.

The effect this man had on our generation reaches further than most people even realize. I, for one, was shocked when I found out about his death. Before Judge Lance Ito made the fatal mistake of allowing cameras into the circus that was the Simpson courtroom, Cochran was known only to those who had received his help in making crooked cops pay for the beatings they inflicted on young blacks. Later in his career he went on to represent Tupac, P. Diddy, Snoop Doggy Dog, and NFL Hall of Famer Jim Brown.

However, he will be remembered for the O.J. Simpson trial, the trial of the century. I have never met one person who thought O.J. was innocent. Yet on the day the verdict was read, I saw O.J. cry in happiness, and I knew injustice had occurred. It took me a long time to get my faith back in the justice system again after I saw Johnnie outfox the legal system in the dafiest of fashions. Although Nicole Brown Simpson and Ron Goldman may never find true eternal peace, Johnnie Cochran performed beautifully.

He did his job. That was the first time I actually sat there and knew that with money you could do anything, like buy your right to kill through the best legal counsel. Sickening, isn't it?

"If the glove does not fit, you must acquit," Cochran told the court while Simpson struggled to put the bloody glove on his hand. He even convinced the jury that the police had planted blood in his car, house, and even at the crime scene.

Simpson was so guilty. I'll never forget the day I sat there with my jaw on the ground. Not guilty? How could this be? Cochran gleamed. Soon he was spoofed on Seinfeld, South Park, and in movies. Seinfeld's Jackie, a lawyer who loved to hear himself talk as much as the real life Cochran, was always into one of Kramer's lawsuit schemes. Oh that Johnny. He had a good sense of humor about the whole thing. "It was fun. At times it was a lot of fun," Cochran would say about it.

Johnny would also counsel Abner Louima, the Haitian immigrant who was tortured by NYC police in 1997 — you know, the broom handle bathroom affair — and won him a large settlement. This was among Cochran's real achievements. Like when he vindicated Black Panther Geronimo Pratt of murder after 27 years behind bars. He was always so proud of cases like these. As a boy he had idolized Thurgood Marshall and now he felt he could help the wrongly accused in the black community. This symbolizes all that is right in the world, while the Simpson verdict symbolizes all that is wrong.

All I know is that Johnnie Cochran Jr. deserves at least our respect as we say goodbye to the man and the end of an era. As Chris Rock would say to a freshly arrested criminal in Lethal Weapon 4, "If you get Johnnie Cochran, I'm gonna kill you." That's just how good he was.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE FAÇADE OF GEN-ED REQUIREMENTS

Mike Anmuth's recent column discussing the "merits of gen-ed requirements" illustrates precisely the irrational arguments, vague fineries of diction, and fervent, naive optimism peculiar to those persons resigned to dullness amidst an abundance of intellectuals. I would suggest that in the future he give more careful thought and heed his senses before philosophizing nonsensically.

What Mr. Anmuth tends to forget is that "college" is not the classic institute of knowledge which we have been led to believe it is. He refutes the idea that college is merely "a machine created only to prepare students for the job market without providing them with a general breadth of knowledge," saying that the gen-ed requirements, in effect, are proof enough that such is not the case. From a more realistic stance, the following should be clear: a liberal arts education, in what was once its definition and is now confined to the Oxford English Dictionary, was supposed to liberate one's mind. It existed for the sake of those who valued knowledge. Furthermore, it should be painfully obvious that every field of knowledge connects to every other, as they all hold significance only by their relationship to humanity. All of our gen-ed requirements are, in theory, elementary starting points. However, in theory, we're also liberating our minds. In practice, the vast majority of students will conclude their formal studies soon before graduating.

While Mr. Anmuth would oppose me here, we, as students at the University of Massachusetts, are essentially in trade school. We are treated as cattle, and just as the mason treats his bricks, so will we treat our future customers, employees, pupils, and children. We are undeniably part of a machine; even the dropouts are highly valued, or else their archetypes would not be yearly admitted by hundreds.

Mr. Anmuth concludes by explaining that "the majority of students find something of interest to them in their liberal arts classes. This phenomenon makes these classes valid enough to keep around even if the knowledge from each individual course isn't remembered down the line." If "something of interest" alone validates the boatloads of time and money spent on gen-eds, then watching television should earn us degrees.

Items of intellectual interest lead to the most painful of questions, and yes there are many facets to the truth; however, determining the properties of a single truth of the universe is rarely on the to-do list of the University's students. Nearly every gen-ed requirement here exists to maintain the façade that we are receiving verily a liberal arts education. A few maintain the other façade: that we embrace diversity.

We are dealing with a single term that at once encompasses both its definition and its opposite's; failing to recognize the difference between the two is Mr. Anmuth's error.

Finally, I do have what Anmuth so moralistically calls "a good answer" to this dilemma. Every person should determine those which are his interests and subsequently pursue them in college, under professorial guidance. The most childish of questions, if pursued to finality, could enlighten the most mature of minds. Also, as each person gravitates towards his own interests, so will the spectrum of knowledge be covered by all, as, certainly, someone was interested enough to invent the fields in the first place.

Asking "what is God?" should be enough to get anyone started in the pursuit of knowledge, and will, undoubtedly, softly and tirelessly force each into a path of benevolent virtuosity. I leave off here, for the sake of concisseness, and hope Mr. Anmuth might find it in his heart to restrain himself from writing further absurdities, embarrassments to the community, and proliferations of the falsity that there are endpoints other than death, viz. "education."

A CALL FOR FIRE SAFETY

The importance of campus fire safety was reinforced last week with the fire at George Washington University and serves as a valuable teachable moment. A freshman was critically injured in a fire that was started by a portable grill igniting the student's bedding material. The building was not fully equipped with an automatic fire sprinkler system but instead only had sprinklers in the hallways and common areas.

The fire was not detected by the building's fire alarm system but instead was seen by a passing Secret Service patrol unit. These officers notified the fire department, entered the building, activated the building's fire alarm system and made several unsuccessful attempts to rescue the trapped victim from the ninth floor before the arrival of the fire department.

It was fortunate that the fire was seen by the officers. However, it was unfortunate that the fire grew to this magnitude because it placed the occupant in the room at great risk as well as the others in the suite and in the rest of the building.

There was another fire this month at Rust College in Mississippi in a women's dormitory that burned seven rooms; yet another example of the danger of residence hall fires. Both of these fires are contrary to what we would expect today in a residence hall, no matter when it was built.

Off-campus fires are a significant concern as well. A student at the University of Massachusetts died in an off-campus house fire and a Tufts University student died in a loft fire in 2001, the DU fraternity was destroyed in a fire.

According to information compiled by the Center for Campus Fire Safety, 80% of the fatalities in student housing fires since 2000 have occurred in off-campus occupancies, where a majority of the students across the country live.

A comprehensive fire safety program that includes Prevention, Detection and Suppression, or as we refer to it, "The Circle of Life," provides a high level of fire safety to all students. Prevention involves educating students about fire safety, and, more importantly, providing them with the "reasons behind the rules." Detection means that there is early detection of the fire and notification of the occupants and emergency responders. This allows the occupants to escape from the fire while it is still relatively small and for the fire department to begin their response as soon as possible. Suppression is accomplished through automatic fire sprinklers which can control or extinguish the fire within seconds, saving lives.

We have known the answers to protecting occupants from fire for many years. The hospitality industry took heed after the tragic fires in Las Vegas in the 1980s, and started an aggressive program to install sprinklers and to put state-of-the art fire alarm systems in many of their hotels. Because of this, in many cases the traveling public has a higher level of fire safety than the youth of our country.

Let's use this fire at George Washington as a "wake-up" call and start ensuring that the students are as equally protected and receive an education in fire safety along with their degree.

Learning to surf

By Desonta Holder
Knight Ridder

MIAMI — "What's nice about out there on the ocean is you're out there with nature, you're on your surfboard, you're looking back at the beach. It's a great feeling."

It's what brings Geoffrey Schmidt back to the ocean. A surfer for 11 years, Schmidt has crafted a living with the wind at his back.

As director of Florida Surf Lessons based in Jupiter, he has been teaching from Cocoa Beach to Miami Beach for six years. The first time humbled this former snowboarder from Boston.

"I figured, 'Hey, I'm a snowboarder so I can go out there and do the same thing.' Heck, no! I could barely stay on the surfboard," says Schmidt, 29. "The thing was slipping all underneath me. I'm grabbing the thing. I couldn't even balance on the board. Because I was young and had a lot of pride, it took me three or six months to finally figure it out."

Surfing, which has been around for hundreds of years, has gained a wave of popularity thanks to movies like "Blue Crush," video games like Kelly Slater's Pro Surfer and nonsurfers making fashion statements with board shorts and bikini tops.

If you'd like to give it a try, hiring an instructor will shorten the learning curve, Schmidt says. Most of his students are spring breakers and students out of school for the summer, but people of all ages can do it, he says. "We can have people standing and riding within one lesson."

After the first lesson, everything above your waist will be hurt, chest, back, abs, neck. It's definitely a workout. To get in shape before you give it a try, sit-ups, push-ups and laps in the pool are ideal.

Imagine lying on a board and paddling out to sea where the waves are. Sounds relaxing, but you have to work at it. You might last two hours if you're not in great shape.

"The more you do it, you gain more respect for the ocean," Schmidt says. "When you do something wrong, you realize really quickly who is in control out there. You might think you got things figured out, but any time that ocean wants to knock you down, it can."

Take hurricane season, when powerful waves pound the beach. This is not a time for beginners or inexperienced surfers, Schmidt cautions. "We don't like to bring students out into waves that are over three feet.

"If you're gonna start charging bigger waves, you got to be a good swimmer," he says. "I've done 6-, 9-, 10-, 12-foot waves, and when you wipe out on a wave like that, it tends to hold you under. You gotta have lung capacity and know how to swim and stay calm in those situations.

"In Hurricane Jeanne, I saw in South Beach about 100-plus surfers, and you had a cop bullhorning people in. The waves were one to three-foot. They weren't big, but there was a hurricane and they think there's this crisis."

Hurricanes aside, surfing is "extremely relaxing; it's spiritual ... You're on your surfboard riding some waves. What could be better than that?"

Artificial Life Inc. gives you a Virtual girlfriend this Spring

By Eric Edwards
The Orlando Sentinel

Back in the dark ages of technology, in the mid-'90s, before iPods, BlackBerrys and cell phones with streaming video, there was a cute little company called Tamagotchi.

For kids who could not persuade their parents to spring for a puppy, a kitty or a boa constrictor, Tamagotchi's Giga-Pets were the perfect compromise. Tiny interactive games, these digital pals required attention as no other video game ever had. If you ignored them too long, they beeped. They beeped when they needed food, and if you didn't feed them for a while, they would die just as real pets would.

It was a matter of time and technology before a hand-held kids' toy was modified for adult consumption.

Enter Vivienne Rose.

Vivienne is an attractive young woman, conversant in six languages and thousands of topics. And as early as this fall, she could be your girlfriend. She's marketed by a Hong Kong company called Artificial Life Inc. as a personal companion or even a practice dummy for the dating illiterate.

She comes to you through your phone at the low, low price of $6 a month (far cheaper than a live girlfriend). But there are additional costs that can make her every bit as expensive as the real thing. Since her moods, activities and basis for conversation are not programmed into the phone but rather are transmitted through computer servers, a date with her can chew up valuable airtime. In fact, this airtime can get so expensive that the company has restricted the time you may spend with Vivienne to an hour a day.

Many may consider a streaming video image a low-maintenance way to have a girlfriend. Think again.

Like a real girlfriend, Vivienne likes to go to the movies and out to restaurants. She also likes to receive virtual flowers, which you can buy her with real money that Artificial Life Inc. will gladly pocket.

She likes the same jewels and intimate conversations that make the flesh-and-blood variety of girlfriend swoon. The more attention you give her, the closer you become. In time, you meet her friends and even her mother if you last long enough. But if you don't dote on her as you would a human girlfriend, she gets just as moody.

No matter what you spend on your virtual sweetheart, don't get your hopes up that you'll even make it to first base. For a newfangled gal, Vivienne is very old-fashioned. As far as sex is concerned, a hand-blown kiss is as close to first base as you get with her. And, no, she won't take her virtual top off no matter how often you ask.

Although physical obstacles limit your relationship, you can go as far as you like emotionally, even to the point of marriage. It is unclear, however, if your cessation of payments to the company is classified as divorce. If so, do you need to tell future girlfriends of your virtual checkered past?

Vivienne is set to be introduced in Malaysia this spring, with the company planning to take her to Europe and America by the end of the year. So next fall, when all of your married buddies are watching the World Series on their cell phones, you can abate your loneliness with Vivienne. With any luck, she'll be able to offer tips that might help you pick up a real girl.

Friend troubles

Original Sin

Eve

I never would have convinced them to get back together if I had known that I would be regretting that decision today.

If only I could take it back, or even convince her to run away, everything would be perfect again. I can't though, because it's too late. She broke the friendship code; she let her boyfriend break us up.

Everyone knows there's little room for three. Someone always has to go, only I never expected that someone to be me.

We grew up together, attached at the hip with few arguments. We know each other better than we know ourselves. Some would even say we are soul mates, while others envy our rare eternal connection. She knows how I feel when I'm quiet and I know what she's thinking when I'm loud. But the moment he waltzed into her life, she suddenly forgot.

At first I understood. She was in love for the first time after three lonely years. She radiated with an overwhelming sense of hope. She could finally take a deep sigh of relief in knowing she had escaped the curse of her single life. I was happy for her. He seemed like a decent man with few flaws, and she was more than ready to accept him into her life. As their relationship progressed, however, something happened.

"I'm pregnant! What do I do?" She cried, desperately searching for answers. I was startled at first, half-upset, half-ecstatic. My pseudo-sister was going to have a baby! It could have been such a wonderful experience, and yet something told us it wasn't right. They had no money, no degree, no marriage, and no outside support. She would have to be fair to the baby.

After much deliberation they decided to have an abortion. Without his company, I went to help her through the ordeal. From that very day onward, something changed inside of her. It was as if she lost a piece of her soul with her unborn child.

Her eyes were tired, helpless, and shut heavily to escape from what she had done. She seemed dead to me, lifeless and emotionless to others. She tried to erase him, tried to return to a life she knew better, but I saw how she became even more miserable with his absence. I played my role and spoke to him before any new decisions were made.

"I love her so much it hurts," he admitted, wiping the stream of tears that poured down his face. "I would do anything for her; she means everything to me." He put his hands over his face and sobbed. And at that moment I realized we have something in common. We both love the same person, and that is all I wanted to hear from him.

I went to tell her about our conversation, about giving it another try, and she smiled for the first time in months. "Thank you so much! You're the best friend ever!" She hugged me tightly and picked up the phone to make things right again.

Their relationship took off smoothly; she was slightly happier, and he made it a priority to sustain this happiness. Even though things were great, I noticed as the months passed by that she was slowly falling into the black hole of dependency, the evils of jealousy, the pains of insecurity, and the pits of depression.

In other words, we were back at square one, but much worse. She barely spoke to her friends, she rarely made time for me, and she became so absorbed in her own issues that she neglected every other important factor in her life.

Why? Maybe she feared she would lose him. Maybe she feared that she had lost herself. Or maybe her need was a scapegoat for the reality she couldn't face. Whatever the reason, she knew I could see what really might be bothering her.

She could see I was upset that she was becoming an acquaintance, a person I could barely recognize anymore. It was like the death of my second half. She lost herself to a man that she thinks she will marry. She looked at me and saw the part of her that had passed on. She couldn't stand it.

"Eve, I need a break from you. There's too much drama and I don't want to deal with it anymore." And that was all she said before she walked away. I know she feels better than me at this moment, but I also know that somewhere deep down she must feel the loss. But for now I suppose I'm off-duty in helping her figure this one out.

The Perceptionists don't care about your bling-bling

Underground act shows Boston pride and isn't afraid to get political

By Nathan Rothstein
Collegian Correspondent

They grew up with Guru, KRS-1 and A Tribe Called Quest. They came of age with Willie McGinest, Tom Brady and Kevin Faulk. Now in 2005, they have come together to form the Perceptionists. The three members of the group include DJ Fakts One, Akrobatik (he spent a semester at Umass) and Mr. Lif. All three hail from Boston and have recently brought Beantown to the forefront of the hip hop world.

Lif, Ak and Fakts One started showing up at the Western Front and Middle East Clubs in Cambridge during the late 1990s. They each had a unique style that quickly caught on with the young hip hop nation. Other emcee's have come out of Boston (Guru), but up till this point they have moved elsewhere to pursue their musical careers. As the three caught on, they stayed with their Boston roots, constantly rhyming about the Charles River, Larry Bird and their beloved New England Patriots.

After Lif and Ak released successful solo albums, they decided to join forces with Fakts One and form a Boston super group. On March 22, their first album, Black Dialogue, hit the record stores.

The record begins with the Boston rappers trying to get the crowd moving. In Let's Move, Ak and Lif attempt to transform their energy on stage into the recording studio. Their first song stays light and playful, but they quickly convert into attackers of the American political system. In People 4 Prez, Ak and Lif waste no time in blasting "the rich little dummy" and suggest a vote for the people instead. They aren't shy about calling him a puppet or making references to the respect the Geneva Convention earns.

After a quick, boastful rap song full of fun references, "wait, you'll be traded upstate like Bledsoe," the rappers get serious again, and they send the strongest political message in music for 2005. On Memorial Day, The Perceptionists shine. The song begins with a question, "Where are the weapons of mass destruction?" and then Lif tells the story of a President who is not willing to sacrifice his life, but instead send the nation's poor to fight his war. After the question is repeated again, they beg the President to explain why nothing has been found. In the last verse, Ak pours his heart and soul into the music. He questions the patriotism of Donald Rumsfeld, Tom Ridge and Condoleeza Rice, and explains how he is still a patriot even if he doubts the political agenda of the ruling party.

In their title track, Black Dialouge, they turn their anger and attention to the music industry. Both Ak and Lif express their disgust with blacks who only rap about girls, cars, and jewelry and have forsaken their morals for money. They mock the rappers who "want homes in the Hamptons," and go as far as saying "it's a minstrel show, so they do what the white man asks them." Lif claims Malcolm X would be rolling in his grave if he saw what some black rappers were doing. To emphasize their message, The Perceptionists finish the song by listing off the names of black role models including, Stevie Wonder, Jim Brown, Chuck D and Langston Hughes.

Rappers Mr. Lif (above) and Akrobatik teamed up with DJ Fakts One to create the political minded group, The Perceptionists. Their album touches on topics ranging from the Celtics to Condoleeza Rice.

As musical songs, their political numbers are good, but not great. The Perceptionists put everything together when they are joined by acclaimed hip hop guests. Their first collaboration includes Guru from Gangstarr, and Camu Tao. The beat is fast paced and addictive, and the verses by Guru, Ak and Lif complement each other perfectly. The next song includes hip hop legend, Humpty Hump from Digital Underground who 15 years ago, introduced Tupac to the hip hop world. The song is humorous, edgy and smart, and most importantly, is a fun listen. The following song, " 3 O'Clock" features Phonte from Little Brother. His soulful voice helps The Perceptionists make their most complete song. The Boston group may not have been able to put everything together, but they came close enough to make this the first great hip hop album of 2005.

Learning about the struggles that face young gay Americans

By Lynn Franey
Knight Ridder

Cody Quintero sees this week of spring break as an opportunity, but not for partying or for sitting around watching bad daytime TV.

Instead, it's a chance to test his leadership skills by taking a handful of other University of Kansas students to Salt Lake City.

There they will educate themselves about important issues among gays and lesbians, especially problems faced by youths who "come out" about their sexuality to their family or friends and the way advocates there are fighting for equal rights for gay Utah residents.

"It goes against the stereotype of how a college student goes to Cancun and parties all week. Not all college students are like that," said Quintero, a 19-year-old sophomore from Dodge City who's majoring in business marketing and communication.

The students plan to spend time at the Gay and Lesbian Center of Utah, talking with young gay people and helping with chores. They also want to help at an AIDS organization and visit with people about the challenges they face.

Quintero also said he was planning a meeting with representatives of Equality Utah, an equal-rights organization for gay Utah residents.

"A group of students can choose to go to sites not only where you build a house but where you're actually getting involved in the community, and students are being put in places that are not normally their comfort zone," said Quintero.

Quintero and the others educated themselves about gay issues before the trip, researching topics such as hate crimes and the religious debate about whether homosexuality is sinful.

They also visited the Lesbian and Gay Community Center of Greater Kansas City.

It's the second year KU students have visited the Utah gay community center. The student who organized the first trip last year got the idea when he was on a previous community-service spring-break trip in Utah and he heard that four in 10 homeless Utah youth were gay, said Kathleen Daughety, who went on the trip last year.

The students' trip is taken under the auspices of KU's student-run Alternative Breaks program.

"It's awesome that the university would offer something like this to a group of students to not only make yourself feel better by helping the homeless or something but actually educating yourself and allowing yourself to go against those norms," Quintero said. "That's an amazing thing."

Looking for a real workout? Try this bad boy on for size

By Lisa Liddane
The Orange County Register

It's high noon at L.A. Boxing in Aliso Viejo, Calif., and Robin Adam is pummeling a black punching bag with a series of jabs, hooks and uppercuts. At the end of the bag session, she drops to the floor for a few hundred abdominal exercises and push-ups. No stranger to exercise, Adam, 45, of Mission Viejo added twice-weekly boxing classes in January to a repertoire that includes Pilates and yoga.

"I was looking for something different," Adam said. And different she got.

Boxing, she said, is "the hardest workout I've ever done. I start sweating within the first 10 minutes."

Although boxing workouts have been around since the '90s, they're getting a minuboost from the Oscar-winning film "Million Dollar Baby," which stars Hilary Swank as an aspiring boxer.

Not surprisingly, most of the recent newcomers to fitness boxing are women.

(It's too early to tell whether the new reality TV series "The Contender" will eventually have the same effect on men.)

In recent weeks, at least 10 women have signed up for boxing workouts and have cited "Million Dollar Baby" as having sparked their interest, said Mike Pacholik, general manager for L.A. Boxing in Aliso Viejo. That modest increase is unusual, he said.

But what's different this time around is the "curiosity among female members in going sparring," Pacholik said. "Ninety percent of our female members generally do not step into the ring."

Having taken a few boxing classes in the past, I'll say that it's much more exciting to trade jabs with a moving opponent than hitting a heavy, but static, bag. It's the logical "what next" - a natural progression after one acquires basic skills. But not everyone is comfortable with or feels the need to take that next step.

Adam said she's thought about sparring one day just to see what it feels like, but not until she masters the fundamentals. "I've got a long way to go," she said. "I want to get good at it."

Whether it's working with a bag or a living partner, there's little doubt about the fitness benefits of boxing classes. It's an excellent workout for cardiovascular conditioning. The bag provides resistance, so you gain strength and muscle endurance. You acquire agility, speed and quickness over time. The twisting and turning movements train your abdominal muscles, especially the obliques.

There are a few varieties of boxing classes. Some involve neither gloves nor bags and focus mostly on cardio. You're punching and jabbing the air. Other classes, such as those at L.A. Boxing, include bag work and calisthenics. Some might incorporate separate sparring sessions in the ring. Use the free trial periods at boxing gyms to experiment with several different classes before you pick the one that feels right for you.

If you're interested in taking boxing, focus not on getting Swank's lean and muscular body - which she achieved by adding 20 pounds through food and hours of strength-training - but on improvements in your fitness. Pay attention to whether you're faster, stronger and more agile and whether your body feels more taut and powerful. Those attributes are what make you fitter.

Disney's number one fan has over 1,600 tattoos to prove it

By Michele Himmelberg
Orange County Register

SANTA ANA, Calif. — George Reiger Jr. claims to be Disney's No. 1 fan.

If you want to challenge him, you'll have to beat this: 1,645 tattoos of Disney characters from the base of his neck to the tops of his toes; a 4,200-square-foot house in Bethlehem, Pa., with 19,000 Disney collector pieces; and six honeymoons at Walt Disney World in Florida.

And when he finally leaves it all behind, his will calls for his ashes to be spread in the Pirates of the Caribbean ride. Nothing is more important than Disney, says Reiger, who was in Anaheim, Calif., last week for the National Fantasy Fan Club convention, a gathering of Disney collectors.

Many have devoted their vacations and paychecks to Disney memorabilia; Reiger has devoted most of his skin, and his life, to the Magic Kingdom.

"My love for Disney comes first, that's why I've been through so many wives," he said last week at the Crown Plaza Anaheim Resort, headquarters for the NFFC meeting. "Both my daughters (ages 18 and 25) have moved out, too. They got tired of everything Disney."

Like the Mickey Mouse waffle iron, Mickey Mouse teapot and cookie jar, and the Little Mermaid-themed bathroom.

Reiger strolled the convention rooms in shorts and a tank top, showing off his tattoos. A decade ago, there were 300 and his goal was 500. Now he keeps squeezing them in, adding 47 Disney rides, 111 cast members and 13 hidden Mickeys to the characters.

Monstro, the whale from Pinocchio, yawns across his belly. Beauty and the Beast dance on his left shoulder. Alice in Wonderland fills his upper arm, surrounded by menacing playing cards. On his back you can count 101 Dalmations, plus two. Yeah, he and his tattoo artist got carried away.

On his forearm is Reiger's first and favorite, the one he got at 18, Mickey Mouse as the apprentice in the film "Fantasia."

There are 28 more in places "only wives can see."

Each tattoo is drawn by Sam Snyder of Easton, Pa. It's part of the deal Reiger made with Disney to wear the copyrighted characters on his body. He also agreed not to appear in a tattoo magazine or to make money off his display.

Reiger admits that it's odd for a 50-year-old man to be obsessed with characters created for children. But he says the magic created by Walt Disney filled the voids of his childhood. He grew up with his grandmother and Disney television shows. He visited his first theme park, Disneyland, at age 8.

"Disney raised me," he said. "It's my family."

He has visited theme parks on three continents, including Walt Disney World 379 times, and figures he pours $50,000 a year into the company cash registers. It's most of what he makes as a postal maintenance worker and magician. He says it makes him happy. "It makes hundreds of thousands of us happy," he said. "That was Walt's dream."

Woods plans to market new Nike equipment

By Carlos Monarrez
Knight Ridder

DETROIT — Psst. Tiger's got a secret. And he doesn't want anyone to know about it until May. Then he'll suddenly want everyone to know about it.

Welcome to another ball change for Tiger Woods.

Last week, Sports Illustrated reported that Woods since January has been playing a prototype Nike ball called the One Platinum. He has been using it to crack 300-yard drives — with a three-wood. He has been rolling in clutch 28-footers at Doral with it. And he has been using it to win a couple of tournaments while playing No. 1 tag with Vijay Singh.

But here's the kicker.

Woods has been hiding the ball from the Darrell Survey — which monitors equipment use on the PGA Tour — by playing a ball stamped with the name of his previous ball, One Gold.

Such is the cloak-and-dagger world of golf equipment manufacturing.

"As is usually the case, he'll put a prototype in play before he signs off on anything," said Nike communications director Dean Stoyer. "He's got to see how it works in competition before we introduce a new ball that's tied to him."

Woods and Rock Ishii, Nike's director of product development, began working on the One Platinum in November. Stoyer said. Woods put it in play at the Mercedes Championships in January and green-lighted the ball for market about two weeks ago.

Woods' desire for a new ball was precipitated by his switch to the massive 460cc Nike Ignite driver he began using at the Tour Championship in November. His new club gave him better control of the livelier ball.

But the One Platinum, whose cover is softer than the One Gold 's, also produced an unexpected benefit for Woods.

"What he remarked on liking the most about it," Stoyer said, "is it's great off the tee, but he hasn't lost, in fact, he's picked up more spin around the greens, which he didn't think was possible with a long ball."

C.W. GRIFFIN/MIAMI HERALD

Tiger smiles after winning at Doral.

As for mere mortal duffers, Stoyer said the ball mostly would benefit amateurs with average-to-high swing speeds.

"The Platinum is really a ball for somebody who has the complete game or wants to exploit the complete game," he said.

The suggested retail price will be $54 per dozen when the One Platinum hits stores in early May.

Pedro shows good signs

By Steve Popper
Knight Ridder

PORT ST. LUCIE, Fla. — After missing his previous spring start with a stiff lower back, Pedro Martinez passed his final test before opening day with an impressive five innings Tuesday against a team of Mets minor-leaguers.

Martinez threw 83 pitches, scattering three singles and allowing one run.

"I felt pretty good before coming out," Martinez said, smiling widely afterward with his arm wrapped with ice and Ace bandages. "But I didn't know what to expect because this is the first time I ever felt something in my back. I noticed by the time I threw on the side that my arm was in pretty good shape and my legs responded well. I got a little fatigued at the end in the bullpen, but that might have been because I didn't do anything for three days, just getting treated. After that I thought everything was going to be fine, because I felt good."

The Mets could breath a sigh of relief, with Martinez striking out eight batters, including the last one he faced before calling it a day.

"We entered today as if it didn't happen," pitching coach Rick Peterson said of the back trouble. "He felt tremendous. You watch that game, watch the effort level, you don't have to ask somebody how they feel. You watch somebody walk across the room you wouldn't have to ask how their leg feels. It's obvious."

Martinez will get five days' rest before Monday's season opener in Cincinnati, throwing a bullpen session on Thursday and then preparing for his first appearance as the ace of the "New Mets."

"Every game is meaningful to every one of us," said Martinez, dismissing any additional significance to the opener. "Proving something? Ah, it gets boring. Too much yada yada about the beginning of the season. They're all important and it's one game."

Peterson countered: "I'm incredibly excited. How can you not be excited? I might have to buy a ticket."

"I'm excited," Mets manager Willie Randolph added. "Any time a manager can put Pedro Martinez out as his opening day starter it's a very good feeling."

The feeling was queasy over the last few days after Martinez was scratched from his last start. He already had been sidelined twice by the rain this spring, making three starts and pitching just 11 innings against major league hitters. But he was not concerned about where he got his pitching in as long as he got it done.

Mascot mired in controversy

By Elizabethe Holland
Knight Ridder

ST. LOUIS, Mo. — Michigan State's "Sparty the Spartan" and the University of Louisville's "Cardinal Bird the Cardinal" will be here for the NCAA Final Four his weekend in all their costume finery. So will "Rameses the Ram," mascot of the University of North Carolina Tar Heels.

But the team symbol with the shortest drive to St. Louis won't make the trip. "Chief Illiniwek" will stay home at the University of Illinois.

The chief — a student in buckskins, feathery headdress and makeup — has become less visible at athletic events over the past five years or so. Except for the occasional road game, like the Braggin' Rights showdown here between Missouri and Illinois, he seldom leaves Urbana-Champaign. There, his appearances are mainly at football, volleyball and men's and women's basketball games, said Kent Brown, the University sports information director.

Often, where there's the chief, there's trouble. Sometimes it's one person in the stands, bellowing charges that the character demeans Native Americans. Sometimes it's an organized demonstration, with harsh signs and angry words.

Detractors have achieved attention, but not the ultimate goal of packing up the costume for good. The chief remains Illinois' official symbol — the University prefers he not be called a mascot — but one that causes discomfort for the athletic program and University as a whole.

Brown said it would not be fair to say the chief's role has been reduced just to quell the controversy. "But it takes that out of play," he added.

Chief Illiniwek does not parade along the sidelines, hang out with the band or pick a pseudo fight with another team's mascot. He is a performer who presents an Indian dance, four to six minutes long, that draws rapt fans to their feet.

Even if the chief came to the Final Four, as he did the last time Illinois made it, the NCAA's carefully planned halftime show probably would not make an opening for his routine, said Tom Hardy, spokesman for the University.

Many high schools and smaller colleges have shed nicknames and symbols based on Native Americans, but fans of Chief Illiniwek insist he is not comparable. They argue that he is a respectful, proud character, who emphasizes the state's heritage and educates people about Native Americans.

"The chief embodies all the qualities that we try to strive for," said Nick Klitzing, president of Students for Chief Illiniwek and a student member of the university's Board of Trustees. "It embodies courage, strength and unity and tradition. He is the token of the University of Illinois and has been for 78 years."

Critics complain that an Indian mascot, particularly at a largely Caucasian campus, is racist and insensitive, and that 78 years of it is about 78 years too many.

"All aspects of the chief and its dance should be eliminated," said Jen Tayabji, a former Illinois student who is a member of the Progressive Resource/Action Cooperative, a group involved in trying to do away with the chief and the "Fighting Illini" moniker.

A symbol should be unifying, not divisive, Tayabji said. If it dissuades Native American students and professors from coming to Illinois, it isn't worth it, she said.

Most importantly, Tayabji said, the fact that many Native Americans find it offensive "is good enough reason to get rid of it."

Kyle Cline, the current Chief Illiniwek, could not be reached for comment.

The Board of Trustees has grappled with the controversy for years. In 1990, it endorsed the chief. But that support may be waning.

In the fall, the board unanimously adopted a resolution that whatever "consensus conclusion" it reached would include recognition of American Indian culture and traditions, Hardy said.

There are plenty of opinions from which to draw. There are whole organizations pro and con. The latter includes a Web site — www.retirethechief.org — started by Brian Jewett, a professor.

About a year ago, nearly 70 percent of Illinois students who voted in a referendum backed the chief.

Meanwhile, a report last fall by the North Central Association, a school accreditation organization, said the University will face damage if the issue isn't resolved.

And earlier this month, opponents of the chief, including the Illinois Native American Bar Association, sued to get the trustees to end the chief's reign. They said he perpetuates a racial stereotype, violates Indians' rights and violates the board's own anti-discrimination policies.

The University has publicly insisted that it isn't violating any laws or policies.

Illinois was one of 31 schools asked by the NCAA in November to explain why they feel it necessary to use American Indian imagery, said Gail Dent, an NCAA spokeswoman. Illinois' self-evaluation is due May 1.

While the chief himself will be absent from the Final Four, there are sure to be plenty of his likenesses on Illinois fans' T-shirts and other gear, and perhaps the occasional fan made up in the chief's image.

Charlene Teters, an Illinois alumna and a member of the Spokane Nation Indian tribe, said she decided about the last time Illinois made the Final Four that it was time for the chief to go. Teters, of Santa Fe, N.M., said she was upset to see her teenage children react to his performance with embarrassment and humiliation.

She eventually helped found the National Coalition on Racism and the Media, and became a familiar figure in the University of Illinois debate.

"This is not just me. It is a movement," Teters said. "But the quality of the debate really hasn't changed much."

Red Sox opt to deal Kim to Colorado for young pitcher

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — The Boston Red Sox have traded right-handed relief pitcher Byung-Hyun Kim to the Colorado Rockies, agreeing to pay most of his salary and calling the two-year, $10 million deal they gave him in 2004 "a mistake."

Kim was sent Wednesday to the Rockies for left-handed pitcher Chris Narveson, 23, who was optioned to Triple-A Pawtucket, and catcher Charles Johnson, who was immediately designated for assignment and released.

The Red Sox will pick up almost all of Kim's $6 million salary, general manager Theo Epstein said.

"We certainly made a mistake, and I take responsibility for that," Epstein said of the two-year, $10 million contract Kim signed before the 2004 season. "It's just a mystery what happened to this guy."

Epstein noted that in 2003, Kim made contributions to the team's playoff run and was at a loss to say what happened to him in 2004.

"I'm not so sure [success] would have happened to him in Boston," he said. "He was crying for a change of scenery."

Epstein said Kim, when informed of the trade, apologized for not doing better.

Kim missed time with the flu this spring and has allowed four earned runs in 6 2-3 innings during the exhibition season. All the while, he has been bombarded with rumors that Boston would try to unload his $6 million salary, or part of it.

"I heard many stories about the trades this offseason, but it's nothing I can control," he said last week. "But I know the general manager and manager and all the teammates still trust in me to help out the team."

Kim, a native of South Korea, was acquired from Arizona on May 29, 2003 in the trade that sent Shea Hillenbrand to the Diamondbacks. He went 6-4 with 16 saves and a 2.28 ERA in 42 outings after being named Boston's closer July 1. He did not allow an earned run in his final 13 regular season appearances.

But he lost the job in the playoffs after allowing the tying run to reach base in the ninth inning of Boston's loss in the first-round opener against Oakland. Then, during player introductions for Game 3 of the Al. division series in 2003 at Fenway Park, he was booed and made an obscene gesture at the crowd. He later apologized.

Clement looks strong for Sox

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Matt Clement's final outing of spring training was his best, and he showed the Red Sox they might not miss Pedro Martinez and Derek Lowe.

Clement allowed one run on two hits in five innings and Jason Varitek and Kevin Youkilis homered in Boston's 6-4 win over the Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

The Red Sox lost Martinez and Lowe to free agency and added Clement, David Wells and Wade Miller. Wells, scheduled to pitch the season opener Sunday at the New York Yankees, had a 7.94 ERA in 17 innings. Miller is expected to start the season on the disabled list and to return in May.

Clement, who played last season for the Chicago Cubs, had an 0-2 record and 5.54 ERA in his other four spring starts. But he felt he built up his arm strength and improved his pitches and is ready for the second game against the Yankees.

"Spring went well. I think I accomplished what I wanted to accomplish and now it doesn't mean squat if you can't do it when the season starts," he said. "I don't see any reason why I can't pitch the same way I've pitched here."

He doesn't feel an extra burden by trying to replace Martinez or Lowe.

"I put high expectations and high goals on myself," said Clement, who struck out five and walked none. "So I feel like I don't need to put any extra pressure on. I know the expectations are there."

Nor is he intimidated by making his Red Sox debut in Yankee Stadium, a place he's never been.

"I'm excited just to go there," he said. "I'm really looking forward to getting to pitch there and getting to be a part of this rivalry."

Boston then scored four runs in the sixth off former Red Sox pitcher Casey Fossum on Kevin Millar's RBI single and Youkilis' three-run homer, his second of the exhibition season.

Youkilis will start the season as a backup to third baseman Bill Mueller. He also has played first base this spring.

"It's our responsibility to find him enough at-bats without getting somebody hurt where he can be productive here and not go backwards," Boston manager Terry Francona said.

Tampa Bay starter Dewon Brazelton pitched three shutout innings and left with a 1-0 lead on Chris Singleton's sacrifice fly in the second. Then Fossum allowed two runs in the fourth on Varitek's two-run homer.

It was Tampa Bay's sixth loss in seven games as it tries to improve from a 70-91 record last year, its second under manager Lou Piniella.

"I would have hoped we'd be a little further along in the process than we are but it's improved," he said.

Notes: Tampa Bay's last two runs came home on Travis Lee's double in the eighth. ... About half the Red Sox left after the game for Arizona where they will play exhibition games Thursday and Friday against the Diamondbacks. Another group stayed behind to wrap up the Grapefruit League season Thursday at Minnesota, which also plays in Fort Myers. ... Curt Schilling and Miller will face each other Saturday morning in an intrasquad minor league game. ... The Red Sox met with union head Don Fehr for more than two hours Wednesday morning. It was the last of his visits to spring training camps.

Wade always trouble

By Scott Bordow
Knight Ridder

MESA, Ariz. — Let's be clear from the start: Arizona State could not have prevented Brandon Falkner's death.

It is Loren Wade who must answer to that charge.

But Wade's continued involvement with the ASU football team up until Falkner's death is on coach Dirk Koetter and athletic director Gene Smith. At the very least, University president Michael Crow should ask himself this question today:

Does Koetter deserve to keep his job?

And if you're Ohio State, do you still want Smith running your athletic department?

It was astonishing Tuesday to hear Smith and Koetter rationalize their decision not to kick Wade off the football team.

Dumbfounding, too, was Crow's defense of two men who, had they acted with just a modicum of common sense, would have washed the university's hands of Saturday morning's shooting.

"No one viewed Loren Wade as a murderer waiting to act," Crow said.

That, we can accept. But either Koetter or Smith should have viewed Wade as a deeply troubled individual who had forfeited the privilege of playing football at ASU.

Let's review what ASU knew of Wade before Saturday's tragedy:

— He had been suspended during the 2004 season for receiving improper benefits from a University employee.

— He had threatened two female athletes, according to Koetter, telling one, "Be careful walking around."

— ASU had been apprised of other allegations against Wade, allegations revealed in only the most general terms on Tuesday because, Koetter said, "It serves no purpose at this point. It won't bring back Brandon Falkner."

The totality of allegations condemning Wade was overwhelming, yet he was practicing with the team and expected to be ASU's No. 1 tailback this season.

Falkner didn't get that kid-glove treatment when he was booted off the team in June 2002 after being in court on charges of driving with a suspended license, no registration, failure to provide evidence of financial responsibility and a violation of a promise to appear.

And justice was swift Tuesday, when freshman linemen Jonathan Lehmann and Brent Russum were dismissed from the team after a female student accused them of photographing her while she was nude and without her consent.

But then, Lehmann, Russum and Falkner were not potential 1,000-yard rushers, were they?

Koetter said Tuesday it's easy "in retrospect" to say Wade shouldn't have been allowed to wear the maroon and gold.

Well, there wouldn't be any second-guessing had the athletic department acknowledged the obvious — that Wade was trouble.

"We didn't connect the dots," Koetter said.

How could they not?

Gymnastics coach John Spini said team member Trisha Dixon told him that when Wade threatened her last November, Wade told her, "Don't be walking alone."

"She was afraid for her life," Spini said.

Both Koetter and Smith knew of the threat, yet on Tuesday they said they believed these were relationship issues, not issues portending violence.

"Nothing in these two cases led us to believe he had a violent act in him," Smith said.

Wade threatens two girls, he's allegedly in possession of a firearm, and the athletic department doesn't believe violence is implied?

And shouldn't someone at ASU be aware that most violent acts are relationship-oriented?

Here's another head-scratcher: Wade had begun counseling in September after telling Koetter he was thinking of quitting football because he was afraid of getting hurt.

Wade stopped going to the sessions at some point — "I don't know when that was," Koetter said — yet ASU's coach saw no need to get Wade further help after he learned of the threats.

"In my mind I didn't connect that with the reason he was seeing the psychologist," Koetter said. "I didn't connect it. Nobody did."

Someone should have.

It's harder to find fault with Koetter for not discovering Wade owned a gun. Neither Dixon nor soccer player Haley van Blommestein, the second athlete to come forward accusing Wade of making a threat, said they had seen him with a gun.

Still, Koetter followed up the rumors. He talked to Wade. He spoke with Wade's mother. He asked Wade's teammates and was met with blank stares — stares, he discovered after the murder, that were hiding lies.

Short of strip-searching Wade and combing through his apartment, what was Koetter to do?

While ASU is absolved of guilt in Falkner's murder, it should be criticized for not coming clean about Wade's threats when given the opportunity Monday.

Smith was asked if there was anything in Wade's past that suggested a violent act. His response — "There were no indicators that really popped out at us to say, 'Hey, this could happen,' " — is, if not a lie, a foolish omission.

How could ASU be so stupid to think Wade's past acts wouldn't come out? Now, the athletic department is not only discredited, it's untrustworthy.

"There's no cover-up here," Koetter said.

That's not how it smells or looks. And to think, ASU could have avoided the heat of Tuesday's press conference and the black eye it has suffered had it simply acted responsibly and kicked Wade off the team.

But that didn't happen.

Now, ASU has to pay for its mistake.

Garcia and Dean overcome personal tragedy before success

By Brian Davis
Knight Ridder

DALLAS — Francisco Garcia and Taquan Dean come from different countries and speak different languages. Yet it made perfect sense when they became roommates at Louisville. Personal heartbreak is their common bond.

Garcia, a 6-foot-7 forward who moved from the Dominican Republic at age 12, lost his younger brother, Hector, in December 2003. Hector Garcia was shot in the lobby of the family's South Bronx housing project. The case remains unsolved.

Dean, a 6-foot-5 guard from Red Bank, N.J., lost his mother at age 6. He recalls leaving her alone to get something to eat, then returning 10 minutes later to find her lifeless on the floor.

Doctors discovered a blood clot in her head.

Today, the two Louisville juniors draw motivation from their past.

Garcia and Dean have national championship aspirations, and both want to someday secure their families' financial futures via the NBA.

Illinois (36-1) is the next team standing in their way at the Final Four in St. Louis.

Michael Ainsworth/The Dallas Morning News

Ellis Myles carries Francisco Garcia out of the gym after Louisville's comeback victory over West Virginia on Saturday.

"For him not even knowing my past when we first met, I guess we saw something in ourselves when looking at each other," Dean said. "We definitely came in with ambition and goals. We want to do everything in our power in order to accomplish that."

Plenty to share

During the years, Garcia and Dean have found more common interests. Garcia lists "Friday" as his favorite movie. Dean's favorite? The sequel. Friday After Next." They both like late-night junk food. And like most roommates, they bicker over who rules the PlayStation and who does more pushups.

It's clear that each player is respectful of the other's background.

Garcia's mother, Miguelina, was already living in New York when he and Hector were growing up in the Dominican Republic. Garcia said his mother, who speaks only Spanish, wanted them to come to America and live a better life.

In Hector's honor, Garcia writes "R.I.P." with black ink on his cherry-red sneakers.

Francisco Garcia was a third baseman in his home country but never really liked baseball that much. The sun was always in his eyes, Garcia said. After arriving in New York, Garcia found playground courts near his housing project and fell in love with basketball.

Garcia's prep school encouraged students to try multiple sports. So Garcia strapped on a helmet and shoulder pads and gave football a shot.

"Went to one practice and that was enough," he said.

Garcia stuck with basketball, and he averaged 16.4 points per game as a sophomore at Louisville.

MSU students have lots to cheer about

By Larry Lage
Associated Press

EAST LANSING, Mich. — Rob Dare and his friends crowded around a TV, screaming as Michigan State competed for a spot in the Final Four.

The students weren't watching the men's team, however. For the first time, Dare and his buddies were tuned in to cheer on the Spartan women.

Michigan State will have its men's and women's teams in the Final Four this weekend and Dare, as much as it surprises him, will be interested in both games.

"Everybody follows the men around here, but now people are jumping on the women's bandwagon, me included," the sophomore said Wednesday. "I was really impressed with them against Stanford. Me and my friends couldn't believe how good they could shoot. Maybe we should've started following them earlier."

Michigan State has gone hoops crazy, a fact that could be seen and heard on and around campus.

Merchandise was hawked on street corners under makeshift tents, and congratulatory messages could be seen on businesses' marquees.

A green and white Spartans blanket attached to a flag pole flapped in the wind in the back of a pickup truck on the eastern edge of campus.

As if a partly cloudy, 70-degree day wasn't enough to create a buzz in the winter-weary college town, two Final Four-bound basketball teams provided an extra boost of excitement.

For the past two weeks, Michigan State president Lou Anna Simon has crisscrossed the country to give equal time to the Spartans in both the men's and women's NCAA tournaments.

There's no rest for Simon now.

"It's a great problem to have," Simon said in interview with The Associated Press a few minutes after the women's team beat Stanford on Tuesday night. "It's going to be a little easier on me this weekend because the sites will be closer together, and the games don't conflict.

"I can't wait to get to the pep rallies and other events we have planned before each game."

Simon will watch the men play North Carolina on Saturday in St. Louis, then travel 250 miles to Indianapolis for the women's game against Tennessee on Sunday.

If both Michigan State teams pull off upsets, Simon will be back in St. Louis on Monday for the men's national championship before wrapping up her whirlwind tour Tuesday night in Indianapolis for the women's title game.

Just six schools have sent both men's and women's teams to the Final Four, but the feat has now happened four years in a row.

Georgia was the first to do it, in 1983, and Duke followed in 1999 before Oklahoma, Texas, Connecticut and now Michigan State had two teams advance to the semifinals from 2002-05. Last year, the Huskies were the first to have both men's and women's teams win national championships in the same season.

Michigan State coach Tom Izzo said superior facilities, successful recruiting and support from the administration likely helped each school pull off the accomplishment.

At Michigan State, the head coaches of both basketball programs are close, and the players are too.

Izzo said he spoke with women's coach Joanne P. McCallie on Wednesday afternoon, a day after he gathered his players to watch her team topple Stanford.

When the women clinched a share of the Big Ten title last month at the Breslin Center, an arena both teams share, some players from the men's team rushed the court alongside other fans.

"That was an amazing, special moment for our program and this community when the guys did that," McCallie said. "They realize we all sweat the same, we all bleed green and it says 'State' on both of our jerseys."

Though the women are a top-seeded team and the men are a fifth-seeded squad, both have had to scramble to win some games en route to the Final Four.

The men beat Kentucky in double overtime on Sunday in a regional final, and the women escaped the second round with a 61-59 win over Southern California. Both will face traditional powerhouses in the Final Four: North Carolina for the men and Tennessee for the women.

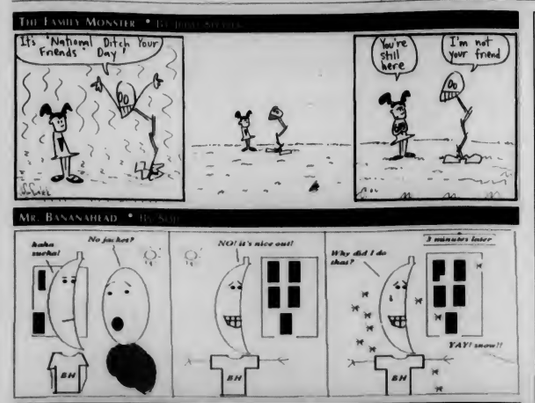
Michigan State's women had not advanced past the second round before this season while the men have won two national championships and are going to the Final Four for the fourth time in seven years, one more trip than any other team since 1999.

Michigan State will open Breslin this weekend so fans can watch the games on the oversized monitors above the court for free.

The College Store, a local store specializing in Michigan State paraphernalia, is hoping soon to have available for sale "This Dance Is For Couples Only" T-shirts featuring both teams.

If such a shirt was on the racks Wednesday, Ronda Bokram would've bought it.

"I'll be back," said Bokram, 49, of East Lansing.



Gov. Jennifer Granholm, who attended the Stanford game, plans to travel to both the men's and women's games this weekend with her 15-year-old daughter Kate.

"The unparalleled sense of pride over the MSU Spartans is permeating the entire state," Granholm said. "The nation has an opportunity to see the character of our student-athletes, our coaches."

Twomley finds groove

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Normally, it takes a baseball player a few games to get back into the swing of things before he can return to prime form. Though UMass senior right fielder Jason Twomley's swing seemed just fine.

Twomley's first action since breaking his wrist on March 5 earned him the ECAC and Atlantic 10 Player of the Week honors for last week. He posted a .700 batting average with four homeruns, seven runs scored and four runs batted in during a three-game series at Xavier last weekend. He is also currently riding a seven-game hitting streak.

The 6-foot, 215-pound outfielder homered in all three games on this past road trip to Cincinnati. In his first game on Saturday, Twomley literally was UMass' entire offense, providing all three of the team's hits including a solo homerun for the Maroon and White's only run in a 2-1 loss.

In the second game of the Saturday doubleheader, Twomley hit a pair of dingers, one on the first at-bat of the game and the other in the fifth inning, as he added two RBIs and three runs to the 6-5 losing effort.

As for Sunday conclusion of the series, Twomley hit his fourth homer of the weekend and went 2-for-4 with an RBI and two runs in a 18-3 loss.

"I felt confident [going into the series]," Twomley said. "I was able to keep my legs fresh by doing a lot of running and speed work. I wanted to put myself in the best possible shape for the Xavier series, and I knew I would be ready to go.

"If I had worried too much about injuring my wrist, I knew that I wasn't going to be able to perform the way I needed to help the team."

As the Massachusetts baseball team looks to produce more offense, Twomley is one of the only two hitters batting over .300 early into the season. His .444 batting average and six homeruns lead the Minutemen, but his 1.079 slugging percentage is the statistic that sticks out the most on the stat sheet.

The senior leadoff hitter is on a power surge as he has hit a home-run in his five games this season and shows no signs of slowing down, as he feels his wrist will not be a problem.

"The wrist feels great, like nothing had happened to it," Twomley said. "If I swing the worry-way, I feel a little tweak, but the doctors did a great job helping me for those three weeks, which is a short time for a bone to heal. I'm just trying to get back to where I was before it happened."

Due to yesterday's poor field conditions, canceling UMass' home opener against Scared Heart, Jason Twomley will look to extend his hitting and homerun streaks this weekend against La Salle. The two teams will play in a doubleheader slated to start at noon on Saturday in UMass' home opener at Earl Lorden Field.

Dayton shocking the A-10

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Through the first part of the 2005 baseball season, the defending Atlantic 10 Champion St. Bonaventure Bonnies are having some serious struggles in terms of living up to the title defense.

After getting off to a 6-1 start this season and garnering a No. 10 ranking on Collegebaseballinsider.com's Northeast Coaches Poll, SBU appears to have hit the wall. Three days after the poll was released (March 16), the Bonnies traveled to Huntington, W.Va. and lost two of three games to the Marshall Thundering Herd.

Last weekend, the Bonnies (9-7 0-3 A-10) continued their slide when they kicked their conference schedule in Dayton, Ohio off to a rocky start, getting swept by the upstart Dayton Flyers, who didn't even qualify for the A-10 Tournament in 2004, by scores of 4-2, 8-0 and 5-2.

The culmination of SBU's recent troubles arguably came last Tuesday, when St. Bonaventure dropped a 15-4 decision to the Penn State Nittany Lions in University Park, Pa.

Freshman left-hander Cody Vincent (2-1) experienced every rookie's nightmare, losing his first outing of the season in convincing style. In 5-2/3 innings of work on the mound, Vincent gave up nine runs (two unearned) on 13 hits while walking three and striking out three.

But there is still reason to be optimistic. Seven batters are currently hitting over .300, the leader of the pack being sophomore infielder Matt Mardeusz. In 16 starts, Mardeusz has tallied a .403 average to go along with team highs in hits (27), doubles (seven) and runs batted in (19). If the bats don't diminish, things are likely to turn for the good for the defending champs.

Flyers surprisingly airborne in '05

Taking two of three from then-No. 20 Notre Dame is one thing. It's another thing to open the A-10 season, where every game counts that much more, by sweeping the defending champions, as Dayton has done so far this season.

Predicted to finish third in the A-10 West, the Flyers (16-7 3-0 A-10) currently sit in second in their division, behind the Richmond Spiders, who are also perfect in conference play at 6-0.

And they're not just going beyond their expectations, as they have proven to be an exciting team to watch, too. After two come-from-behind wins against the Irish and breaking stalemates with St. Bonaventure by cranking out clutch hits, UD may have achieved its most impressive feat of the year yesterday afternoon at Time Warner Stadium.

Down by 14 runs against the Butler Bulldogs in the third inning, Dayton stormed back on monstrous efforts at the plate from Bobby Getty (3-for-6, three RBI, five runs, one single shy of the cycle), Michael Massa (3-for-4, three runs, two RBI) and Bryan Chandler (3-for-4, three runs, three RBI), and ended up winning 21-17 despite being out-hit 17-16.

Dayton certainly has the chance to keep things rolling this weekend when they host the Rhode Island Rams, (6-10 2-1 A-10), whose pitching staff has a combined earned run average of 5.18.

Michalski named finalist for Johnny Bench Award

If things keep going the right way for George Washington senior catcher Joe Michalski, he just might come away with some of college baseball's most honorable gold.

Last Monday, the Ellicott City, Md. native was one of 37 catchers named a finalist for the Johnny Bench Award, given annually to college baseball's best catcher. Established in 2000, past award recipients include former Alabama standout and current Oakland A's catcher Jeremy Brown, most notably of fame from Michael Lewis' 2003 best-selling novel "Moneyball".

Weather hurts UM at home

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team is one of the most dominant home teams in the country. The Minutewomen play at one of the finest softball facilities in the Northeast, the UMass Softball Complex, and are a remarkable 85-5 all-time on their home field, including 72 straight regular season home games.

Seemingly the only thing that can prevent UMass (10-9 2-0 Atlantic 10) from dominating on its home field is the weather. UMass is 0-for-3 so far this year in beating the weather and actually playing a home game.

UMass was scheduled to play Syracuse in a doubleheader in its home opener last Thursday, but the games were canceled because of snow. After the warm weather last weekend, it appeared the field would be ready for UMass to host Central Connecticut State Tuesday, but Monday's rain left the field unplayable again. The CCSU contest has been postponed until April 13. UMass has already had 11 games canceled or postponed due to weather this season.

UMass was scheduled to host Dartmouth (3-8) in a doubleheader on Wednesday, but field conditions pushed the games back a day. UMass coach Elaine Sortino is hopeful that the weather will finally cooperate, and her team will be able to resume its home dominance today against Dartmouth.

"We just want to get on the field," Sortino said. "The team will be excited when they see that the game is actually going to happen. They're definitely looking forward to it. We don't spend too much time worrying about the weather because there's nothing we can do about it."

Sortino is especially happy that her team will get to return to the friendly confines of the UMass Softball Complex after playing the first 19 games of the season on the road.

"We love to play on our home field," Sortino said. "We spend the first 10-to-12 weeks on the road so it's wonderful to come home. We have a great crowd and get wonderful support."

Sortino intentionally loads the front end of the schedule with top competition so her team will be playing at a high level when the conference schedule begins. This practice seems to be working again this year as the Minutewomen come into today's contests on a three-game winning streak, including a doubleheader sweep at Dayton in their first A-10 action of the season.

"This is the time when I look for things to settle in and get into gear," Sortino said. "We're getting a great deal of consistency in our practices, and that consistency lends itself to our game performance. We have a sense of who we are now. The continuity from having the opportunity to play is very helpful. The team is very talented offensively and defensively and we're starting to see flashes of that."

Before the season, Sortino said this year's squad had the potential to be one of the best offensive teams ever at UMass. After a slow start, her lofty expectations are being validated.

Not surprisingly, the offense is being led by junior catcher KJ Kelly, who has closed to within one of tying the all-time school record for home runs. Kelly leads the Minutewomen with a .348 batting average and is tied at the top in home runs with four. Kelly is expected to miss today's game, however, as she is recovering from a badly sprained ankle.

Another expected offensive leader is senior shortstop Hilary Puglia, the reigning A-10 Player of the Year. Puglia is third on the team with a .339 batting average and leads the team with 13 runs scored.

Senior outfielder Denise Denis has stepped up her production this year, as she is tied with Kelly for the team home run lead and leads the team with 16 RBI. Denis has been named A-10 Player of the Week in each of the past two weeks.

Freshmen centerfielder Lauren Proctor has added to this already potent mix. Proctor is batting .346, which is second on the team, and brings an eight-game hitting streak into today's game.

While Sortino is pleased with her team's offensive production this year, she does not know what to expect from Dartmouth. Today's game will be the first meeting ever between the two schools.

"I don't know the team, but I know the coach so I expect them to be fundamentally sound and make a great run at us," Sortino said.

Minutewomen dispose of URI

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (11-6 3-0 Atlantic 10) opened its outdoor season in Amherst with a 7-0 drubbing of Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island (3-8 0-2 A-10).

The Minutewomen dominated the Rams in every aspect of the game. They swept all six singles matches and all three doubles matches. Every singles participant beat her opponent in straight sets.

However, UMass coach Judy Dixon said that there is still room for improvement.

"We didn't play too sharp today," Dixon noted. "It's a difficult time of year, going from playing indoors to playing outdoors and we had tough weekend."

Freshman Masha Pozar played well picking up a victory in the No. 1 slot. Pozar outplayed her opponent, junior Erin Fleming, beating her in straight sets 6-1, 6-2.

The match was highlighted by a long series of volleys in the fourth game of the second set. Pozar and Fleming exchanged shots back and forth until Pozar was able to bounce a forehand off the net that was out of reach for her opponent.

Following two losses in the No. 1 slot last week it looks as though Pozar may be settling in to the top spot of the lineup.

"Masha is extremely talented and has a lot of potential," Dixon proclaimed. "She is a solid No. 1 or 2 for us."

For a while in the second set, it looked as if Fleming would give Pozar a run for her money, but Fleming was unable to close the gap between her and the UMass freshman.

Dixon was also pleased with the play of her senior captain Sasha Edelstein. Edelstein won her match in the No. 2 slot over sophomore Revathi Annapareddy, who never led as she bowed to Edelstein 6-0, 6-1.

"Sasha played very well for us today," Dixon said.

Also picking up singles victories for the Minutewomen were junior Dorothy Iwanowicz at No. 3, junior Susan Johnson at No. 4, junior Jana Bartolini at No. 5 and freshman Kristin Dipiero at No. 6.

"It was good that we were able to give Kristin some court experience today because if any one goes down she's the next person in line to step up," Dixon said.

The Minutewomen were able to secure the doubles point by sweeping all three matches.

Iwanowicz and Johnson teamed up to take the match at No. 1 by a score of 8-1. The duo was too much for the Rams' Fleming and senior Bridgette LaFlamme. At one point in the match Johnson rocketed a forehand off the shoulder of Fleming.

"Susan had a really good day, she was able to pick up two big wins for us in the singles and doubles," Dixon said.

The team of Bartolini and Edelstein defeated Annapareddy and freshman Emily Conant in the No. 2 doubles slot. Bartolini and Edelstein dominated and cruised to an 8-1 finish.

Dipiero and junior Lesley Fisher took the No. 3 doubles match by a score of 8-2.

UMass was able to record the shut out even with its hottest player, sophomore Michele Spiess, not in the line up against the Rams. Dixon felt that Spiess could use a day of rest following a three-set match against Temple on Thursday and a four-hour match against Richmond on Friday.

"It's that time of year when players need a day off here and there," Dixon explained.

The Maroon and White take on A-10 rival Fordham (8-4) next Wednesday at home.

Coaches looking for decisive edge in NCAA tournament

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

One is a 48-year-old newcomer.

Two have rings, two don't.

Three will leave St. Louis heartbroken, one won't.

Crunch the numbers any way you want. What they guarantee is a very intriguing Final Four.

Illinois' Bruce Weber, the only member of the coaching quartet who's never ventured this deep into the NCAA tournament, has been calling friends in the business for tips on what to expect.

"He's a 3-point shot at the buzzer from being perfect this season," joked Louisville's Rick Pitino, whose Cardinals face the Illini in the first semifinal Saturday night. "He doesn't need any advice from me."

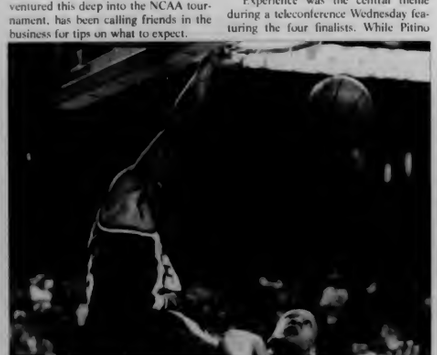
"I told him to get rid of his ticket and hotel problems by Sunday or Monday," added Michigan State's Tom Izzo. "The first time we went, I think I was still dealing with that stuff all the way through Friday."

Experience was the central theme during a teleconference Wednesday featuring the four finalists. While Pitino and Izzo have already won national championships, and North Carolina's Roy Williams is at the Final Four for the fifth time as a head coach, they have nothing on Weber in what might be the most important factor in that equation.

After scanning all four rosters, Izzo came up with only one player who's even been to a Final Four, and that's his own Tim Bograkos, a fifth-year senior and former walk-on.

By the same token, all four teams are led by upperclassmen, which the coaches agreed was the difference in getting this far in what has been an upset-filled, last-gasp tournament so far. The top high school seniors and underclassmen continue to depart for the NBA, but the depth of talent and experience on the Final Four teams proves the top coaches, at least, have learned to adapt.

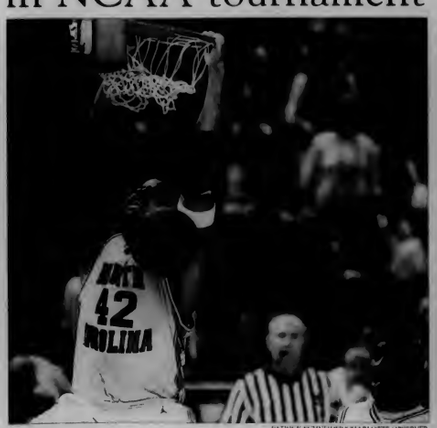
"If you look at the last six, seven, eight years, teams like UConn, I think all those teams had plenty of juniors and seniors. The only exception was Syracuse," said Izzo, with a nod toward Carmelo Anthony, "and they just happened to have one of the greatest players in the game."



But finding a way to close the experience gap among players wasn't the only change the coaches have had to deal with in recent years.

The 3-point shot has become more prominent as more and more teams employed a version of the zone defense that brought Syracuse and Jim Boeheim a national title, and that has forced coaches to adapt on both ends of the floor. But that trend has also tempted too many players to hoist long-range shots at inopportune moments.

Asked what he was thinking about watching all those treys being thrown up from all over the floor during last weekend's games, Williams deadpanned, "The first thing I start looking for is the closest exit I can sneak out."



But that may be because Carolina has Sean May, arguably the best big man left in the tournament, and prefers to run its offense from the inside out.

"I like it," said Weber, whose team put up almost three dozen 3s in a furious comeback win against Arizona in overtime. "When it first became a rule, it became a thing where it was used too much. I think last week was just unusual."

Swans electrocuted out of pond by UMPD's tasers

By Stumble Inn
Morning Wood Staff

With a 50,000-watt jolt and a loud "honk!," the lives of the swans on the campus pond came to an abrupt end yesterday.

The swans were shocked with the controversial Taser guns by University of Massachusetts Police after the animals were reportedly agitating innocent students. Police claim they gave repeated verbal warnings to the swans to retreat back into the water, but to no avail.

"It's a very humane tool," said Det. Lt. Robert Thrasher, an officer who responded to the scene. "It's better than beating them with a baton."

Collegian beats KKK-9 photos in contest

By Big Carrot
Morning Wood Staff

It has not been a smooth year for the reputation of the Student Government Association. And today will not been much different, according to the National Institute of Photography.

The staff of the Morning Wood have taken first place in the international photography competition "Registered Student Organization College Drunks," beating the SGA and SCERA's submission 'KKK-9 Drunks.'

The photo, which shows senators, SGA and SCERA members drinking alcoholic beverages and playing card games in the SCERA offices, as well as a caricature drawn on a dry erase board fashioned to resemble Senator Patrick Higgins. The figure holds a burning cross, wears a pointed hat, a cap and a shirt that reads "Grand Wizard." Above, the words "I love ALANA" float in a word bubble. The University punished those involved after the photo was discovered posted on a Web site.

The Morning Wood staff, who don't have their heads stuck far enough up their poop-holes to even consider such stupidity, were overjoyed with their win. However, Seamus Brennan, Head Whining Pussy at the of University of Massachusetts and Speaker of the SGA had, as usual, a complaint to make.

"I should have won that photo contest," Brennan wailed, "even though I wasn't really drinking beer. It was canned water."

Brennan said if he hadn't been falsely accused of being a racist Bud Light drinker, he would have had the Morning Wood, along with the rest of UMass, on their knees.

"That's impossible," said MeeMee Busted. Brennan's first.

Uggz banned from campus; Gargano to begin 'Abercrombie and Bitch' dress code

By Nogag Reflex
Morning Woods Press

In a long-overdue announcement, Uggz boots, a furry Australian boot made from skins of baby llamas, have officially been banned from the University of Massachusetts by the chapter of the International Fashion Snafu Police, Bufu, (Banning Unsightly Fashion Upsets) and the GROSS, Get Rid Of Skanky Sorority Sisters society.

"I'll never survive without my Uggz," whined one sister from the Sigma Tuba Dumba, or STD. "The pink ones hide the jungle juice stains when I'm kneeling on concrete floors at Sig Ep."

As a result of the ban, 75 percent of female students in Southwest will be unable to attend classes — at least until they figure out a way to make mini skirts look fashionable again.

The decree has been a cause for concern for Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante, whose main voters were Uggz-owners.

"My textbook rental system will NEVER survive if girls can't walk across campus to rent them," said Bustamante, as he paused from a conversation on his circa 1992 cell phone.

"In order to get elected, I never had to think. I just had to rub my pecs with baby oil before every presidential debate. This new GROSS and Bufu rule makes me think hard. Ouch."

Also disappointed by the decree was Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano, who was found sadly removing his purple all-terrain Uggz in his Whitmore office.

"They were so fuzzy wuzzy duzzy," wailed the vice chancellor.

Gargano, who plans to auction his signed pair of Uggz off for charity, said he has had several offers, including one from the sisters of Delta Zeta.

"If we're the highest bidders, Gargano promises to return our crack pipes," squealed one sorority woman.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi declared earlier today that all money made at the Uggz auction will be donated to the Take Back UMass fund.

"Because Lord knows they need it," said Lombardi.

When asked for comment, members of the Graduate Student Senate said they had no idea what Uggz were, and had nothing to say on the issue. According to Daily Collegian records, this has never happened before.

"It's like one of us losing our virginity!" said one disgruntled member. "It's just never happened before."

"I think Uggz is that stuff we scrape out of the fenders of the PVTA buses and boil up in the woks," said Ken Toong, Dining Services Director. "We call it 'A Taste of UMass.'"

In reaction to a campus-wide outcry, Gargano has promised he will push to implement a new fashion snafu — a mandatory popped-collar dress code.

"This campus needs a little less Gap and a little more Abercrombie and Bitch," he said. "But I still get to wear my nifty jogging suits, I'm G-Unit."

Under the new dress code, male students are required to own no fewer than three pink polo shirts, and no fewer than two layers of polo shirts must be worn by all students at all times — collars popped, of course.

The administration says not only will mandatory popped-collars prove that UMass is the biggest wanna-be-private university in America, it will also teach students how to use starch, an old laundry aid that most students are unaware of. On campus, most undergrads are overjoyed with the new dress code.

Cory Rosenberg, a brother in the Homer Simpson frat house, says Gargano is a genius.

Michael Gargano is implimenting a mandatory polo shirt/popped color dress code, thrilling much of the wanna-be-prep student population.

"I think it says something about guys who wear pink. Here at UMass, we are very comfortable with our masculinity," he said.

All students who refuse to wear polo shirts will be transferred to Hampshire College.

"Our collars need a little more flip-up, and our dorms need a little more flip-cup," said Gargano.

Administration to impliment diversity with tanning beds

By Nota Racist
Morning Woods Staff

In a recent attempt to meet the Diversity Commission Report recommendations, University of Massachusetts Amherst Chancellor John V. Lombardi, Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs Charlena Seymour, and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano have bought tanning packages and mandated that faculty begin tanning in order to darken the general skin color around campus.

"Simply saying we'll do it is one thing. But we hope to raise racial awareness among students and faculty by showing that we're willing to change our appearances for the good of diversity," Lombardi said.

"The Commission on Campus Diversity report recommended that we increase faculty diversity on campus. Unfortunately, it's a long, involved process to hire faculty members. The fastest way to achieve increased diversity is to mandate that certain faculty members go tanning," Gargano said.

Campus officials say they are aware of the health risks of tanning, and are willing to allow professors to spray tan for an alternate source of color.

"Tanning is not superficial. It is real," said Seymore. "Color is real."

In other attempts to increase diversity in the students campus, the University Dining Services has added skin-dying agents to their blue Powerade mix.

"Perhaps if we all darken our skin, we'll no longer see a difference between dark and light," said Dining Services Director Ken Toong.

"I have no idea what the Diversity Commission Report said," replied Gargano. "I mean, who really reads 80 pages in an online PDF file? Tanning sounds like diversity to me, and drinking the hidden calories in Powerade keeps our students fat and happy."

"Okay, maybe somewhere along the line someone admitted too many white students. Our bad. But, like Gargano said, we can't just mail out letters to our students saying, 'sorry, you don't fit our diversity standards. Go somewhere else.' So instead, we're telling students to drink up that blue Powerade," Lombardi urged.

The University is taking extra care to push male students to go tanning, a trend that has already been creating an orange blur on campus.

"I've really got to hand it to the metrosexuals," said Gargano. "In other years, our male students rarely, if ever, went tanning."

"It takes a real man to do something normally considered so ... gay," Lombardi said.

In addition, the administration is currently considering giving tuition breaks to students who commit to go tanning year-round.

'Humane tool' fries swans; Bustamante says he 'likes beef'

Not so, says SGA President Eduardo Bustamante, who admittedly was not present at the incident, but strongly disagrees with the use of TASERs.

"It's inhumane. It's unnecessary. It treats us like we're stupid cows," Bustamante said.

When Bustamante was reminded that half the women in the SGA are cows, he responded by saying, "I like beef."

UMPD Chief Barbara O'Connor says her officers interpreted the swan's noises as threatening messages. An officers claims he interpreted one of the swans as saying, "Give me your Bluewall doughnut," and "All your base are belong to us."

It was after these alleged statements were made that the TASERs were used.

Thrasher claims that one of his officers was trained in American "Swan Speech." This is a highly complicated technique of decoding messages by swans through sound and body language, he says.

"The swans were definitely going to snatch our doughnuts," he said. "And with the Bluewall prices so high right now, we just couldn't take that risk."

When People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals spokeswoman Furie Beaver learned that that TASER incident occurred because of alleged threats over a doughnut, she appeared infuriated.

"This is a gross misuse of power," Beaver said. "I would have spotted the officer 80 cents for the friggin' doughnut."

"I'm outraged," said sophomore Sam Davis, an engineering major. "Why couldn't they have called MSPCA or something?"

"I can understand why they needed to do it," said a junior Spanish major. "I don't even go to the Bluewall anymore because their prices are so high."

O'Connor says the incident was necessary to ensure the safety of the public.

"I'm proud of my officers," she said. "Safety is our number one priority."

Gargano grabs for the TIT

By B. Resticles
Morning Wood Staff

Due to the great success of the Commission on Campus Diversity Chancellor John "J-Lo" Lombardi has decided to start a whole slew of Blue Ribbon Committees. In addition to the Crosswalk Development Coalition, or CDC, the Delinquency Determent Team, or DDT and the North East Squirrel Naturalists, also known as NESN, J-Lo has also created of the Truancy Investigative Taskforce, referred to as TIT.

"I am very pleased to announce the start of a new era at UMass, an era where all the students show up for class, and every seat is full ... with the TIT in action I know that this ideal can be met," said the wanna-be-bootylicous Chancellor.

However, Michael "G-Unit" Gargano is skeptical. "Truancy is a non-issue to the administration. Once the students pay their tuition we could really care less if they show up for class," G-Unit said. "Money buys my designer maroon and white jogging suits, so I can attend Southwest riots in comfort and style."

"I am not sure that the TIT will stimulate students," G-Unit said. "I really feel that before I can endorse the TIT, I will need to get a firmer grasp on it."

Although no one has been chosen yet as the director of the TIT, the UMass administration has a few people in mind, all of which "have intently studied truancy and the cleavage it can cause in an education." Some of the prospective directors include Mr. Feeny of John Adams High and Mr. Belding formally of Bayside High.

The TIT will work closely with the University of Massachusetts Police Department said J-Lo. He believes that this team will be able to decrease truancy in a flash. UMPD announced in a press release that it is currently "researching many tactics that can be used to coerce students to attend class."

One such tactic was developed by Zapp-em Inc. and it is called the TED (short for Taser-Bed). The TED is a fairly simply mechanism which requires a special mattresses that has thin copper wire interlaced with the rest of the fabric. A regulator box is then connected to the mattress and can be set to initiate an electrical shock to the person or persons in the bed at a designated time.

Ideally, the regulator box will be linked into SPIRE and it will be able to download a student's class schedule, thus knowing what time the student must be out of bed. In addition to this the bed will remain electrified for the entirety of the class so that students cannot simply wake up and then get back into bed. TEDs have been used in several state and federal penitentiaries across the country with overwhelmingly positive results.

The SGA released a statement shortly after the press conference that read: "We never support the administration in any of its endeavors. We continue to be pains in the asses."

Many students protested the press conference claiming that the TIT is an invasion of student's privacy. They picketed outside, but not inside, the Whitmore Administration Building holding signs that ready "TITties are for pussies," and "Squeeze the TIT." However, many non-newspaper reading males responded to the protestors with confusion.

"Who screwed the TIT?" asked one student.

"Your mama," answered one protester.

Putin challenges Bush to boxing

By Demo Cratshirt
Morning Wood Staff

In an unprecedented statement, the Russian president Vladimir Putin declared at a press conference yesterday that he is, "tired of Bush's senseless rhetoric about his doubts in Russian democracy" and is ready to settle their differences "man to man."

Putin has stated that he is "ready to fight" and went as far as saying that "Bush wouldn't last two rounds."

Bush, who was at a pie-eating contest when he heard the news, was quoted saying "Texans don't git scared!" and "I'll dominate him like Michael Jackson dominates little boys."

"This declaration does not come as a surprise," said Senior political analyst Theck Wood. "Vladimir really detests Bush's southern accent."

As bets are already being taken worldwide on the fight, it is becoming apparent that America is not completely comprised of Jesus-freaks and abortion-clinic bombers. In fact, many wagers, including those from conservatives, are for Putin.

"The only one thing that I ever bet Bush would win," said Ray Publican, "is a primate look-alike contest."

"Vladmir takes it in the buy-hind," said Bush. "Just like those damn buy-buy killin' lay-brals."

This declaration may have been triggered by another Putin-diss by Bush at a press conference yesterday afternoon. When asked how his relationship with the Russian president is, Bush responded by shrugging his shoulders, shaking his head, and gurgled "Glog, glog," while making the international symbol for binge drinking.

"Vye doo not know vhat 'take in ass' means, but Bush will be mowed down," replied Putin at his press conference.

Putin has since cut off all contact with the Bush administration. "No more Vister Nice Guy," said Putin.

The light is scheduled for July 4. The two parties have agreed that whoever wins this fight will gain control of the other's country.

TASERs will surely solve all of UMass' problems

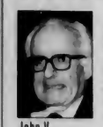
The issue of TASERs on campus is one that many people disagree on. Should cops be allowed to use TASERs? Do TASERs infringe upon student's rights? TASERs, TASERs, TASERs, TASERs.

The issue is really a moot one, and the answer is simple. OF COURSE cops should be allowed to use TASERs! How else can they keep the student body at bay? The population of this campus is 20,000 strong, at least half of which riot on a weekly basis. The small police force, comprised of nearly two dozen fat, balding impotent middle-aged men, is no match for the students, unless they arm themselves properly.

Just look at all of the problems that riotous students have caused: the millions of dollars in property damage, the flipped cars, the fires, the tarnishing of the UMass reputation, the sacrifices of unwilling freshmen theater majors and the continuation of the anti-Yankees sentiment on campus (I mean, in reality, Derek Jeter isn't that bad of a guy). Police simply need a way to prevent these things from happening, and TASERs are the answer.

And it shouldn't end with police officers, either. Equipping professors with TASERs would greatly cut down on students being absent from class. Just imagine if a professor had the power to shock a student for missing a lecture. Attendance at classes would be close to perfect!

We could also employ a roving force of janitors on campus, equipped with TASERs in hand, to shock the shit out of students for littering (like when they throw those disgusting banana-flavored condom wrappers on the ground). We could even bring back the campus swans and strap TASERs to their backs in case any student tried to harass the pond's wildlife.



Finally, students themselves could be allowed to use TASERs, if the situation was warranted. Specifically, we Morning Wood employees could use the weapons on members of the UMass Theater Guild every time they start practicing for "Seussical: The Musical" in the room down the hall from our offices. Maybe shocking the snot out of those no-talent asshats would shut them the hell up, allowing us to work in peace. This would give us the opportunity to produce an overall better publication for the student body to read and enjoy on a daily basis.

Some say that TASERs are too excessive. This is simply not the case. The weapon fires two small needles, which penetrate the skin and deliver an electric shock for about five seconds. The wires deliver a 50,000-volt charge at 1.36 joules of electricity. Getting shocked by 1.36 joules is actually insignificant, when you consider that by comparison, a heart defibrillator has 300 joules. In reality, a shock of 1.36 joules isn't even powerful enough to give Michael Gargano a hard-on, let alone cause any real damage. If police are trained properly, which all UMass police would be if the weapons were ever purchased, TASERs are a harmless tool. And we all know that if there is one thing UMass police are, it's trained properly.

TASERs are undoubtedly the future of the university. They will save money in the long run, make the campus a safer place to live and make riots a thing of the past. The Morning Wood fully endorsees the use of TASERs by all police officer, professors, janitors swans and Morning Wood employees.

More than just a pretty face

John V. Lombardi

I write this column in The Morning Wood with the sincere hope that all members of the student body read and comprehend what I have to say. In my opinion, this is a matter of the utmost importance, and one that all students need to be aware.

I am referring to the student body's complete and utter lack of respect for our beloved Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Mr. Michael Armando Jebediah Gargano.

If only the student body knew Mikey like I knew him. If only they could see his softer side, his gentler side. If only they could share long walks on the beach with him, stare adoringly into his baby-blue eyes and slowly caress his ...

OK, getting back to the point. Michael Gargano is a pillar of the campus community. Sure, maybe he can be annoying some times. Maybe he cries like a baby when he doesn't get his way. And maybe his unattractiveness rivals that of Michael Jackson's mug shot, but he's really a good guy at heart.

Just think of all the good things he has done for the student body:

SHAKE THAT ASS

How else would students stay informed about the happenings on campus if it weren't for the mass emails Mikey G. sent them? Granted, the "GO UMASS" sentiment in the emails is a bit cheesy and corny, and most of the time he's just rambling about how he can't wait for the warm weather so he can see the new summer clothing line of the female student population. But really, with the T&A in Southwest these days, can you blame the guy? It doesn't matter if it's Abercrombie OR the GAP, if it's skanky enough those girls will wear it. Trust me, with an atmosphere like that it's hard not to express your lust and desire to the entire campus.

MORE BOOBIES

As for the picketing controversy, I must take full responsi-

If only the student body knew Mikey like I knew him. If only they could see his softer side, his gentler side. If only they could share long walks on the beach with him, stare adoringly into his baby-blue eyes and slowly caress his ...

bility for that one. Mikey never wanted to prohibit the right of students to picket in buildings. He told me that the more angry students get, the more they will jump up and down in anger, and if we piss off enough girls on campus, sooner or later we will have hundreds of busty freshman jumping up and down in front of our offices. I never even considered that! I eventually saw the light, and reduced the picketing code restrictions. What a stroke of brilliance on Mikey's part.

(If that last comment angered any females in particular, feel free to jump up and down in protest in front of my office, 374 Whitmore, between the hours of 2 and 5 p.m. on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays).

GOTTA DIVERISFY

Then there's Mikey's relationship with ALANA, the Asian, Lesbian, Albino, Narcoleptic Algerian something-or-other group (I mean, really, who can remember what it actually stands for).

A student was quoted in a previous Morning Wood article as saying, "Gargano's consistent attacks on ALANA students reflect his overall goal of turning UMass into a school that caters to out-of-state students and wealthy families ... and he tortures puppies."

I can't speak for the second allegation that Little Miss Whiny Pants made, but as for the first complaint, she couldn't be more right. Why shouldn't we try to attract wealthy, out-of-state students to our campus? Doesn't that improve diversity? Isn't diversity what everyone wants? I mean, make up your damn minds, people!

So in closing, let me just say that Michael Gargano is a premier administrator at this fine university, who has exceeded all of my expectations.

John V. Lombardi is the Chancellor of UMass, and a lover of Michael Gargano ... Not that there's anything wrong with that.

A little slice of my life

Mr. Slice

It's not easy being me.

Don't be fooled by the permanent grin above the mushroom. My life really sucks. To top it all off, I'm stuck dealing with those little brats all the time. I want you to know, I want the world to know, I was not always like this.

It all began many years ago you see. I was so young, sitting on that counter top. Then it happened. Two of my brothers were taken from me. I sat and watched beneath the glass casing as they were covered in oregano and garlic, then devoured by savages. It was hard and I am forever scarred. Little did I know that what was about to happen next would change my life even more.

It was a slow night. The rest of my brothers and I stuck close together. We avoided the savage death of our siblings only to be tossed out into the garbage later that evening. At least we had each other.

It was a cold night. All of us could feel it. My cheese had long since hardened. Tommy, one of my brothers, had lost a pepper and one of his mushrooms was dangling off. This too was painful to watch.

As dawn approached there was a roaring sound and then a steady beeping. A colossal truck was lifting the trash can we were in and my brothers and I began sliding towards the abyss. Together we were ready to face this but our lord and creator, the Oven, must not have wanted it this way. I had slid out the side of the large bin and I lay now on the street, hard cheese down, only to look up and see the truck carrying my brothers away from me. The license plate read "Massachusetts."

Since that day, I have devoted my life to finding my brothers. I have hit rock bottom many times. I cannot begin to tell you the number of times I was peeled off the street by a local garbage collector only to go back. On one of these occasions I met my ex-wife, Mrs. Slice, and she had tried to help me. Soon enough though I was hitting the crack pipe. The depression caused from my traumatic experiences was getting to me.

Mrs. Slice threatened to leave me. I begged her not to. She was all I had. Then she began to pack her bags and said she was going to move in with her grandmother in Italy. I wouldn't let her leave. We fought and I hit her. It was the saddest moment of my life. Watching the tomato sauce ooze out of her made me realize what I have become. I never saw her again.

They said I would be playing hockey. It turns out this was some community service gig. I would have to play goalie against some little kids. God, I hate those bastards.

I began to wander the streets, from alley to alley. I went from one major city to the next. I learned to drive in New York. I learned to play hockey in Montreal. I learned to curse at baseball games on T.V. in Boston. It was there in Boston that someone had noticed me. They took me to a rehab center where guys like me could get away from the crack.

They took me to western Massachusetts for special counseling. It looked like the same shit hole as eastern Massachusetts to me. I can't be sure though, I saw a lot of that back then. They set me up with this program. They looked at my skills and found me a job. They said I would be playing hockey. It turns out this was some community service gig. I would have to play goalie against some little kids. God, I hate those bastards.

The worst part is that I had to work with the Minuteman. He is such a fairy f. One day, after thinking about my brothers, I saw him downstairs in the Mullins Center. I noticed he had some tomato sauce on his face and I beat him within an inch of his life. I would have finished the job but then I noticed the Domino's box he had been eating out of and realized it wasn't one of my family members. We were private stock.

So, this is what I do now. I try to deal with it by ruining those little kids' evenings. I don't let a shot past me. If I do, I have troubling dealing with it, but a needle ends up taking care of that.

I wanted to let you know about my story and I seek your help. Please, if you see my brothers, let them know where they can find me; coked up and playing with little kids. They will be excited to hear from me. Until then, I will see you next season.

Mr. Slice is the best goaltender to play on Mullins Center ice.

UMass politicians and the 'crooked' men they screw

Tony Soprano

First of all, let me make one thing clear: If I hear the words "Yankees suck!" comin' outta any of your mouths again, your gonna find Francesca's dead body, along with the rest of those pussy assholes, at the bottom of your little campus piss hole there. But, aside from that, I've been noticing some things on this campus, particularly coming from the administration that got me really disgusted. Like, I'm talkin' about things only spineless, good-for-nuttin' pansies that can't satisfy their wives would do.

This Gargano character has got to be the epitome of sexual insecurity. This is really simple: he's not executing his power correctly. If you want people to respect you, you gotta make sure you have a hidden, obscure past that comes up every now and then on the front page of the Ledger ... I mean, whatever rag you guys read.

And as far as this Lombardi guy goes, what kinda man can't even handle a bunch of college clubs doing their own thing? Do college kids scare him so bad that he's gotta put some fruit-cake peacock in charge of 'em? This is a sure sign of a corrupt leadership, and I don't like corruption. The last guy that crossed my path who dealt a crooked hand found himself in the middle of the Meadowlands with no pants on watching his SUV sink into the marsh. Where I come from, we don't tolerate that shit.

For all of you who think you represent the student body (and I'm talking to you, SGA and administrators) ... you might as well be speaking on behalf of your asshole, cause that's the only thing you guys have in common with any of the students at UMass.

Now, what is the fin' deal with all this SGA bullshit? Quite frankly, they all look like a bunch of stuck-up kids who didn't get beat enough as children. I'd love nothin' more than to walk into one of their "meetings," and beat each one of those kids till they shit their teeth out with my signed Mickey Mantle baseball bat. I'd like to see 'em say somethin' about the Yankees then, fin' Kerry-lovin' bastards.

What none of you seems to be understandin' is that this is all petty shit. I mean, all student government associations are bullshit. They're not respected in the real world. Look, do you really think it'll matter that you were a "senator" or "trustee" during years three to five at UMass? Employers don't give a shit about that! Besides, if you think being on the SGA is going to cancel out the fact that you had to stay an extra two semesters at a state school where any jerk off with a line of credit can get into, you need your head examined.

Christ, I got nephews in junior high who could present a better argument on why they should stay out later than all of these guys put together, trying to convince the administration to give them what they want. Pussies.

You wanna know something? Real people work for a living! And I'm not talkin' sittin' on your ass and pretendin' like you're important. That ain't work. So, for all of you who think you represent the student body (and I'm talking to you, SGA and administrators) ... you might as well be speaking on behalf of your asshole, cause that's the only thing you guys have in common with any of the students at UMass.

You know, this school has some real potential to become something worth giving two shits about. And, the problem is pretty simple to fix too. The students need to stop acting like they can run the fing school. It's not theirs to run, but belongs to the state of Massachusetts. And don't give me any of that "I pay for this school" bullshit. We all know damn well your rich parents who also pay for your rent check once a month, along with your weekly alcohol allowance, write the checks to UMass.

And as for those knock-off Italian wannabe bastards Lombardi and Gargano, I say this: if you're lookin' for your wives, they're with me makin' up for lost time.

Tony Soprano is the spokespetson for all those who think UMass has been shot to shit.

We don't give a shit

(but tell us anyway)

Now that the textbook rental system is being implemented, what else should UMass students be allowed to rent?

A) Professors in a box.
B) TA TASERs.
C) "UMass Administrators Gone Wild" DVDs.
D) C. U. Next Tuesday!

UMass law school plan rejected

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts lost its bid to for the state's first public law school Thursday, after the Board of Higher Education voted against the proposal.

This was the University's second attempt at making a publicly funded law school in four years. The board's 8-5 vote was viewed as a huge defeat by University administrators, including UMass President Jack Wilson.

Wilson told the Associated Press he believed the board had strong support for the law school concept and hopes the plan could one day be resurrected.

"What I heard today was strong support for the concept," he said to the AP. "We have to come away, analyze this and decide where we go from here."

President of the Southern New England School of Law's Student Bar Association, Ryan Benharris, says he's extremely displeased with the board's decision.

"Chairman [Steven] Tocco should be ashamed of himself," he said.

"It is the students who lose out here," UMass Dartmouth Chancellor Jean F. MacCormack, an architect of the proposal told the AP. She blamed "interference" by the private law schools.

"I have never seen this level of scrutiny," she said.

The board's concerns over how the new school would handle its finances was prime reason the law school was rejected, says board Chairman Steven Tocco. The board claims that UMass' plan to place revenue from the school into an on-campus fund, rather than into the state treasury, appeared to be illegal.

"The view of our legal officer is important," said Tocco.

Tocco called for the end of such trust funds, which are used elsewhere in the university system, citing lack of public disclosure.

Governor Mitt Romney, who has remained silent on the law school issue, said the board made "the responsible decision" Thursday, "given the unanswered questions surrounding this proposal."

The proposed latest law school plan, before it was defeated, reduced in-state tuition from $19,000 to $16,000, and Wilson planned to launch a major fundraising campaign.

But Higher Education Chancellor Judith Gill, who oversaw the board's research into to proposal, said there still were concerns about a budget "so constrained and sensitive" that any miscue on enrollment projections would be costly.

Administrators at private law schools claimed the University eventually would need taxpayer support to get accredited.

Benharris says the board's decision goes against the wishes of thousands of public higher education students.

"I speak on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of students currently enrolled in public higher education and the millions of students who will someday enroll in it when I say that I have been cheated by the Board of Higher Education," Benharris said.

Brain-damaged Terri Schiavo dead

By Vickie Chachere
Associated Press

PINELLAS PARK, Fla. — With her husband and parents feuding to the bitter end and beyond, Terri Schiavo died Thursday, 13 days after her feeding tube was removed in a wrenching right-to-die dispute that engulfed the courts, Capitol Hill and the White House and divided the country.

Cradled by her husband, Schiavo, 41, died a "calm, peaceful and gentle death" at about 9 a.m., a stuffed animal under her arm, flowers arranged around her hospice room, said George Felos, Michael Schiavo's attorney.

No one from her side of the family was with her at the moment of her death. Her parents, Bob and Mary Schindler, were not at the hospice, Felos said. And her brother had been expelled from the room at Michael Schiavo's request moments before the end came.

The death of the severely brain-damaged woman brought to a close what was easily the longest, most bitter — and most heavily litigated — right-to-die dispute in U.S. history.

"Mr. Schiavo's overriding concern here was to provide for Terri a peaceful death with dignity," said Felos, who was also present at the death.

But the Rev. Frank Pavone, one of the Schindlers' spiritual advisers, called her death "a killing," adding: "And for that we not only grieve that Terri has passed but we grieve that our nation has allowed such an atrocity as this and we pray that it will never happen again."

Jeff Asmussen, who favored continued life-support for Terri Schiavo, protests outside Woodside Hospice in Pinellas Park, Fla., Thursday.

Schiavo suffered brain damage in 1990 and fell into what court-appointed doctors called a persistent vegetative state, with no real consciousness or chance of recovery, after a chemical imbalance caused her heart to stop. She had left no written instructions in the event she became disabled.

Her husband argued that she told him long ago that she would not want to kept alive artificially. Her parents disputed that, and held out hope for a miracle recovery for a daughter they said still laughed with them and struggled to talk.

Pinellas County Circuit Judge George W. Greer sided with her husband and authorized the removal of the feeding tube keeping her alive. It was disconnected March 18.

During the seven-year legal battle, federal and state courts repeatedly rejected extraordinary attempts at intervention by Florida lawmakers, Gov. Jeb Bush, Congress and President Bush on behalf of her parents.

Supporters of her parents, many of them anti-abortion activists and political conservatives, harshly criticized the courts. Many religious groups, including the Roman Catholic Church, said the removal of sustenance violated fundamental religious tenets.

About 40 judges in six courts were involved in the case at one point or another. Six times, the U.S. Supreme Court declined to intervene. As Schiavo's life ebbed away, Congress rushed through a bill to allow the federal courts to take up the case, and President Bush signed it March 21. But the federal courts refused to step in.

The case prompted many people to Dining Services tsunami fundraiser a big success

By Jake Monte
Collegian Correspondent

Eight hundred and eighty students skipped a meal on Monday around the University of Massachusetts campus to benefit the victims of the tsunami disaster in Southeast Asia.

The event occurred at all UMass dining commons and local retail outlets. MassPIRG teamed up with UMass Dining Services and coordinated the fundraiser. The price of the meal skipped will be donated to tsunami relief along with the price of the food that was not produced because of the reduction in students eating at the dining halls.

According to Ken Toong, the director of UMass Dining Services, the fund-raiser was an overwhelming success. The 880 students who signed up to skip a meal resulted in estimated donations of $1,500 to $2,000 dollars for tsunami relief efforts. It costs between $1.80 and $2.00 to produce a meal, according to Toong.

MassPIRG and the other Student PIRG chapters around the country are working in partnership with Oxfam America to raise money for tsunami relief this semester. Dining Services will send a check to OxFam, who will use much of the money to provide vaccinations for tsunami victims.

According to Akil Williams, MassPIRG Hunger and Homelessness campaign coordinator even a small donations could substantially help the life of a tsunami victim.

"If 2,500 students participate, enough money will be raised to provide vaccinations for 4,375 people against deadly epidemic diseases," Williams said.

In the past, Dining Services hasn't had as much success with "skip a meal" fundraisers. Usually they get a few hundred people, but that's not even half as many who participated this time.

Toong credits the widespread publicity about the tsunami disaster with the fundraisers success. Almost eight percent of the campus signed up.

"It proved how caring UMass students are," Toong said.

The sign up for the "Skip a Meal" fundraiser took place between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. at tables in all dining commons on March 23. On hundred and seventy-two people who normally eat at the Franklin Dining Hall signed up for the "skip a meal" dinner. That's 11 percent of their normal dinner attendance.

The dining halls waited to cook the meal until a little before the students who are not participating arrived so there was not a lot of over-production. Roberta Potter, the manager of Franklin Dining Hall, said, "we were a little slower but not enough to cut production or service significantly. It was certainly no trouble for Franklin to do this." The administrative aspects of the fund-raiser were handled by the meal plan office and the dining commons each had table tents and a sign up table ahead of time.

"We were delighted to participate. We have a really good team at Franklin and they are always ready to help with causes like these," Potter said.

Skip a Meal fund-raisers have gained in popularity over the past several years and many universities raise thousands of dollars every year for various causes through this method. When asked if they would sponsor more fund-raisers, Toong said, "We'd be delighted."

"We are proud of our students who are willing to skip a meal to contribute to the efforts of raising money for the tsunami relief. Thank you for your support."

Alternative spring break is appealing to students

By Martha Irvine
Associated Press

CHICAGO — It's spring break, but there's no beach and no kicking back for Alice Tin.

The 17-year-old junior from a boarding school in suburban Boston is dipping raw chicken in flour, getting it ready to fry at a Chicago cafe that serves the homeless and others in need. Fifteen-year-old Renia Davis is among those delivering lemonade and meals. And Matt Kamps, 17, is in the back doing dishes.

They're on what's known as an "alternative spring break," a growing trend among college and, increasingly, high school students who spend their vacations building houses, helping hurricane victims and delving into topics ranging from sustainable agriculture to literacy.

These particular high school students spent their recent break in Chicago learning about poverty and homelessness with the Civic Education Project, a nonprofit at Northwestern University that organizes spring and summer programs for high schoolers. Among other things, they trained as vendors for a newspaper written and sold by homeless people; volunteered at an after-school program in a low-income neighborhood; and sorted and repackaged items donated to the Greater Chicago Food Depository.

"I don't see it like I'm giving up spring break. I feel like I'm taking advantage of a good opportunity," says volunteer Brenda Chu, a 15-year-old from Plainsboro, N.J., who attends a boarding school in Deerfield, Mass.

For others, learning more about homelessness was personal.

"I'm faced with this issue daily, so it was less of a choice to be here and something that needed to be done," says Whitney Smith, a 16-year-old who lives on Chicago's impoverished West Side. A high school junior, she is hoping to attend Boston College and become a lawyer who deals with public policy and, very likely, issues related to poverty.

What began with a few students from Vanderbilt University organizing volunteer trips in the late 1980s has grown to nearly 40,000 students choosing to go on an alternative spring breaks each year, says Jake Brewer. He's executive director of Break Away, a nonprofit organization in Tallahassee, Fla., that began in 1991 and now has more than 120 student chapters, most of them at colleges but a few at high schools.

Each year, his organization puts its chapters in touch with organizations that need help, from Habitat for Humanity and The Nature Conservancy to lesser-known nonprofits in other countries.

Some students camp or stay at churches. Others are put up at places such as Hostelling International, which has become a partner with Break Away and other alternative break organizations.

And bucking a long-standing spring break tradition, most alternative spring breaks have a "no alcohol" rule. "They remember the experience long, long after they come home, which may not be true if you're drunk on the beach in Florida," Brewer says, chuckling.

NYC officials approve plans to build $1.9 billion stadium

By Erin McClam
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A proposed $1.9 billion stadium designed to lure the 2012 Olympics to the city cleared its biggest hurdle yet Thursday, winning the blessing of the state agency that owns the land and handing a major victory to Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

The Metropolitan Transportation Authority board unanimously accepted a $720 million offer from the New York Jets to develop the site over a remote railyard on Manhattan's West Side, turning down two competing proposals worth more money.

The 75,000-seat stadium is backed by the city and state and would allow the Jets to play in New York for the first time in a quarter-century. The Jets currently play home games at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J.

Jets President Jay Cross said he hoped construction could begin in July, noting the NFL recently awarded the city the 2010 Super Bowl on the condition of a new stadium.

Bloomberg, a Republican, has made the stadium the early centerpiece of his re-election campaign, insisting it will create jobs and growth for years to come in a largely underdeveloped frontier along the Hudson River.

In a statement, the mayor praised the Jets for investing in the city's future and added, "But ultimately, New Yorkers will be the big winners if this project becomes reality."

Many New Yorkers do not share his zeal, opposing the plan by 53 percent to 38 percent, according to a Quinnipiac University poll released before the vote. Some residents have said the stadium will cause too much congestion and cost too much money.

"Why are you doing this?" City Council speaker and Democratic mayoral hopeful Gifford Miller asked the MTA board during public comment before the vote. "This is not over. This is a terrible mistake."

Outside the hearing, anti-stadium demonstrators began chanting "Sweetheart deal!" after the vote was finished, while union workers backing the plan replied, "Jobs! Jobs!"

Olympic officials have said building the stadium is critical to New York's bid. The International Olympic Committee will award the Games in July. Paris, London, Madrid and Moscow are the other finalists.

Schiavo's death has public discussing right to die issue

ponder what they would want if they, too, were in such a desperate medical situation, and many rushed to draw up living wills. The case also led to a furious debate over the proper role of government in life-and-death decisions, and whether the Republicans in Congress violated their party's principles of limited government and deference to the states by getting involved.

In Washington on Thursday, the president was careful to extend condolences to Schiavo's "families" — meaning both Michael Schiavo and the Schindlers — even though he backed efforts to reconnect her feeding tube.

"I urge all those who honor Terri Schiavo to continue to work to build a culture of life where all Americans are welcomed and valued and protected, especially those who live at the mercy of others," the president said.

House Republican Leader Tom DeLay condemned the state and federal judges who refused to prolong her life, and he warned that lawmakers "will look at an arrogant and out-of-control judiciary that thumbs its nose at Congress and the president."

"I never thought I'd see the day when a U.S. judge stopped feeding a living American so that they took 14 days to die," he said.

Gov. Jeb Bush, the president's brother, said that Schiavo's death "is a window through which we can see the many issues left unresolved in our families and in our society. For that, we can be thankful for all that the life of Terri Schiavo has taught us."

Outside the hospice — where over the past few weeks more than 50 protesters were arrested, many for trying to symbolically bring Schiavo food and water — demonstrators wept, prayed and sang religious hymns. Some threw their protest signs down in disgust.

"You saw a murder happening," said one demonstrator, Dominique Hanks.

Report says Pope given his last rites

By Frances D'Emilio
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II developed a high fever Thursday because of a urinary tract infection and was being treated with antibiotics at the Vatican, his spokesman said. The latest health setback for the 84-year-old pontiff came one day after he began receiving nutrition through a feeding tube.

"The Holy Father today was struck by a high-fever caused by a confirmed infection of the urinary tract," spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls told The Associated Press by telephone.

The pope was receiving antibiotics at the Vatican, Navarro-Valls said.

"The medical situation is being strictly controlled by the Vatican medical team that is taking care of him," he said.

Italian media said there were unconfirmed reports John Paul had received the sacrament of the sick and dying — what used to be called the last rites or extreme unction — but Vatican officials could not be reached for comment. The sacrament was renamed to reflect that it could be received by the sick as well as the dying.

At the Gemelli Polyclinic, where the pope has been treated before, an emergency room chief said there were no plans to admit John Paul "at the moment," the Italian news agency ANSA said.

Lights in the papal apartment above St. Peter's Square were on until about 11 p.m., generally well past the papal bedtime.

Police cars and other vehicles were seen going in and out of the Vatican gates as the evening wore on, and a small crowd of Italians who were following news on television began gathering at the edge of the square.

Earlier, ANSA and another Italian news agency, Apcom, said the pope had suffered an alarming drop in blood pressure Thursday evening.

A urinary infection can produce fever and a drop in blood pressure as reported in the pope, said Dr Marc Siegel, a specialist in internal medicine at the New York University Medical Center.

The pope's risk of such an infection is heightened because he is elderly — which suggests his prostate is probably enlarged — debilitated and run down from the illness that recently sent him to the hospital, Siegel said.

Urinary infections tend to respond well to antibiotics, given either as pills or intravenously, and "I would suspect there's a very good chance he's going to recover well," Siegel said.

Hospitalized twice last month following two breathing crises and with a tube placed in his throat to help him breathe, John Paul has become a picture of suffering. When he appeared at his apartment window Wednesday to bless pilgrims in St. Peter's Square, he managed to utter only a rasp.

Later that day, the Vatican announced he had been fitted with a feeding tube in his nose to help boost his nutritional intake.

The use of the feeding tube illustrates a key point of Roman Catholic policy John Paul has proclaimed: It is morally necessary to give patients food and water, no matter their condition.

As Parkinson's disease and other ailments have left him increasingly frail, the pope has been emphasizing that the chronically ill, "prisoners of their condition ... retain their human dignity in all its fullness."

The Vatican's attitude to the chronically ill has been apparent in its bitter condemnation of a judge's order two weeks ago to remove a feeding tube from Terri Schiavo, the severely brain-damaged American woman who died Thursday.

Vatican Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, reacting to Schiavo's death, denounced the removal of her feeding tube as "an attack against God."

Cheering for the 'bad guys'

Ben Duffy

So what do Bruce Springsteen and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi have in common?

That's the question Roger Van Bekel, a center-left political writer of some stature, asked when he stumbled across David Horowitz's new superstie... www.discoverthenetwork.org. As the Web site's name would suggest, it is Horowitz's guide to the worldwide leftwing "network."

When Horowitz refers to the Left as a "network," he's talking about the web of money trails, the interlocked personal histories, the associations between individuals and groups, the front organizations, and the many hidden connections that form the well-oiled political machine. Horowitz recently unveiled his masterpiece, a comprehensive exposé of the Left.

From the moment of its birth, Discoverthenetwork.org caused a lot of headaches for Horowitz. Detractors were incensed that he had created such a broad classification omitted simply "individuals." Hence the outrage of Roger Van Bekel, who couldn't believe that Bruce Springsteen would be lumped together with Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. What did the two have in common? Was Horowitz suggesting that Springsteen, a self-described "progressive," was cut from the same cloth as terrorist thugs? Could you even call a Muslim extremist a "leftist"? Aren't "progressives" and radical Muslims as different as night and day?

Well, Mr. Van Bekel, I've been wondering the same thing myself. How did we end up in the peculiar situation we are in today in which the agendas, interests, and the rhetoric of Muslim extremists have become so close to those of hardcore left wingers?

To the bench of Mr. Van Bekel, Springsteen does not belong in the same category as al-Zarqawi. And to the benefit of Mr. Horowitz, he was open to this criticism, and subsequently revised his website into five more specific categories.

But the issue isn't resolved there. The fact remains that some on the ultra-Left have willingly aligned themselves with Muslim extremists. Perhaps Bruce Springsteen isn't a good example of this, but I could think of plenty who are.

The fact remains that some on the ultra-Left have willingly aligned themselves with Muslim extremists. Perhaps Bruce Springsteen isn't a good example of this, but I could think of plenty who are.

Michael Moore showed his true colors on April 14, 2004. Moore wrote in his blog, "The Iraqis who have risen up against the occupation are not 'insurgents' or 'terrorists' or 'The Enemy.' They are the revolution, the Minutemen and their numbers will grow — and they will win."

This statement is from a man who "really supports the troops." Or does he support their enemies, those who used violence and threats of violence to dissuade voters from casting their ballots? The same enemy that tries to keep girls out of school, for fear that they might learn to read? That shoots election workers? That proclaims that democracy is "the worst form of government" because it entails the right to choose one's religion? That is composed of Ba'athists and al-Qaeda members? Is this the "revolution" he was talking about? Well, it's nice to hear Moore finally admit whose side he's on.

Need another example? Lynne Stewart is a lifelong leftist and a despicable human being. She is also in jail, thank goodness, serving time for aiding a terrorist organization.

As a member of a communist front organization, the National Lawyers Guild, she served as the defense attorney of terrorist leader Sheikh Omar Abdul Rahman, leader of Al Jama'a al-Islamiya (the Islamic Group). This organization has strong ties to al-Qaeda.

Rahman's main claim to infamy is that he masterminded the 1993 bombing of the Twin Towers. While in jail, Rahman passed information to Stewart, which Stewart passed to the media, in direct violation of the law. She also facilitated illegal communications between Rahman and his interpreter, who then became a link to his followers on the outside.

Defenders of Stewart say that she is being persecuted for speaking out against the War on Terror, and that illegal police tactics were used to ensnare her. The aforementioned National Lawyers Guild has rallied to her defense, and leftist billionaire George Soros has donated $20,000 for legal expenses. Osama bin Laden, a close ally of Rahman, has also thrown his support to Stewart. He has called for her release on at least one of his many videotapes.

Stewart has spent a lifetime defending some extremely unsavory characters, including members of the Black Panther Party and the Weather Underground. She is a longtime fan of Castro, Stalin, and Mao. I think the label "far-left" would be entirely descriptive of Lynne Stewart.

But how did she get to be so enamored with Sheikh Omar Abdul Rahman? He is certainly no lefty. Rahman has fought for the subordination of women and Islamic theocratic revolution in Egypt.

Van Bekel is right to ask what "progressives" are doing on the same page as radical jihadists. But that's not David Horowitz's question to answer. He should be asking that question to Lynne Stewart, Michael Moore, and the innumerable other left-wing crackpots who cheer for the bad guys.

Osama bin Laden said it best when he pronounced, "The interests of Muslims and the interests of the socialists coincide in the war against the crusaders." That videotape ran on al-Jazeera, on Feb. 12, 2003, just before the Iraq war began. Osama must be a smart man, because he knows who his allies are in this country. They make strange bedfellows, but they are bedfellows nonetheless.

Defiling nature's sanctuary

Katelyn Harding

Polar bears are known for their large size and whiteness of fur. Their lack of pigmentation seems to reflect their environment, with its assortment of whites that blend together to create the natural beauty of their habitat.

Maybe the polar bears' coats are so white, Senator Frank Murkowski of Alaska seemed to have not noticed them living in their natural habitat. He stated that all you can see in the winter in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is just "snow and ice." He didn't seem to have a problem with drilling for oil in this location. But there is a problem. The polar bears, 13,000 caribou and thousands of other animals that inhabit this land are voiceless in their defense. They are helpless against the arrogance and greed of our president, George W. Bush.

President Bush, along with other oil-industry leaders, are making plans to drill in the Arctic for what they believe to be a great source for oil under the whiteness of the landscape. This drilling would take place smack in the middle of a homeland to thousands of Arctic animals. Bush and his constituents believe that drilling for oil in ANWR will help reduce high fuel prices in America. The problem is, all of this drilling would take about 10 years or so to bring to the market, and even then would satisfy only about six months of our national demand, according to the Defenders of Wildlife Web site, www.defenders.org/wildlife/arctic/arissue. Relief for just six months is too short a time for what would result in the death of an entire species.

Although wildlife experts are worried about all of the animals that would be affected by this invasion, their biggest fear concerns the caribou. Thousands of the native caribou migrate each spring into the area that is going to be drilled. Basically, they travel about 400 miles to procreate, and then return home. The drilling that the president wants to do so badly will severely disrupt this migration. It might not seem like a big deal to you, but it could lead to an ultimate extinction of this animal.

Just ask the 5,000 members of the Gwich'in tribe, who disagree with the drilling because they rely on the caribou for food. You would be a little upset if your main source of food was going to be killed off, wouldn't you?

The drilling could essentially force polar bears to abandon their maternity dens, which would mean their cubs would die. And it would also endanger the fragile balance of habitat that supports the rich diversity of wildlife in the Arctic region.

After Bush and the oil-industry leaders are done with drilling, the Arctic will no longer be a beautifully natural sanctuary. It will become defiled, another victim fallen to the greed of our president.

Since the oil is scattered in small accumulations, it wouldn't be easy to extract from the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. This in turn results in the oil companies having to build miles and miles of pipelines, wells, roads and helicopter pads. Despite technological advances in the oil industry, experts say this widespread development would massively scar the land with garbage, pollution and oil runoff.

Democrats vehemently disagree with Bush's drilling plans. They believe that his plan "focuses on drilling and production at the expense of our environment and conservation." said House of Representatives Democratic leader Dick Gephardt of Montana. "And it does nothing to help people who need relief now." Despite the concerns amongst Democrats, Republicans remain smug in their decision. Said Vice President Dick Cheney, "The tasks ahead are great but achievable." Yes, they are achievable, but Bush, Cheney and oil-industry leaders are not taking into consideration the loss of thousands of animals native to the Arctic region. To Bush, these animals mean nothing, as long as he gets what he wants.

This land that Bush is so willing to deface was set aside by the U.S. government for protection more than 40 years ago under Dwight D. Eisenhower. In 1957, Secretary of the Interior Fred Seaton set aside 8.9 million acres of coastal plain and mountains of northeastern Alaska as the Arctic National Wildlife Range. He said he wanted to protect its "unique wildlife, wilderness and recreation values," according to the Defenders of Wildlife Web site.

No matter how carefully executed, the drilling would spoil the Arctic land forever. It would leave a permanent mark on a land that has been protected to preserve its natural state.

The unique whiteness of the polar bears might be the best lasting memory we have of them. After Bush and the oil-industry leaders are done with drilling, the Arctic will no longer be a beautifully natural sanctuary. It will become defiled, another victim fallen to the greed of our president. The Arctic nation will smear into a white blob on our maps, a place that used to represent beauty, but now would only represent the complete abolishment of one of the last natural refuges that we have to offer.

The passion of collective energy

Mike Anmuth

With Maroon 5 performing on our beloved campus in the next week, I can't avoid the column which I've wanted to write all year: collective energy and why it's fantastic. I've written about the weather, the university, the student body and various other topics, but I have wanted to write about collective energy and concerts, specifically. I just haven't had a reason. Enter the reason, stage right.

Concerts, to me, are this serene place where everyone is there for the same purpose, to see either or all of the artists performing, and where the collective energy is astounding. Where else can you sing along at the top of your lungs, jump up and down and look over at the person next to you who is doing the same exact thing? Probably at a karaoke bar, actually, especially if you sing songs where more than one person is required, but I digress. The lines are blurred at concerts and it feels as though every person is part of something much bigger, not just a fan base but one vibrant, electric feeling that is tapping its collective feet and harmonizing along with the performance.

This energy is not just present at concerts, it is also apparent at sporting events, protests, rallies and even our well-known and often-discussed riots present on campus. I have taken introductory communication courses, learned all about groupthink and how people will follow a charismatic leader, but I am not addressing the issue of political, moral, social or otherwise issues being discussed; I am simply speaking about a time and place where people all come together for a purpose and then create a solitary vibe for that purpose.

Perhaps you will not forget all of your troubles, or any of them for that matter, but for however many hours you're attending that concert, you are one with the music and the music is one with you.

Often, these collections of people, especially at protests and rallies, are how things get accomplished, and I am definitely a proponent of Gandhi-like style of assembly for change. I see signs all over campus about events where students are taking charge, creating that collective energy, and showing themselves in whatever cause they believe. If we did not have this sort of energy, we would have many solitary voices, but nowhere to exhibit them, and quite possibly, they might not be heard.

Still, concerts represent a different side of the spectrum because they are not about change but rather about enjoyment, and having music as a living, breathing entity. The experience for everyone at concerts is different, but personally, I find myself getting lost in the songs, even if I have heard them countless times on CDs and the radio. There's something about live music that creates a situation where you not only empathize with the person next to you, who is also rocking out, but you empathize with the lyrics and the instruments and you internalize them.

This might sound odd to you, especially if you don't feel the same feelings that I do when I attend concerts. Bob Marley once said, "One great thing about music is when it hits you, you feel no pain." I tend to agree with Bob Marley on this one, the music floods through you and everyone else and that collective energy makes you "feel no pain." Perhaps you will not forget all of your troubles, or any of them for that matter, but for however many hours you're attending that concert, you are one with the music and the music is one with you.

By now, you may be asking, "Mike, why write an entire column about collective energy?" An excellent question, and my answer would be, because it is a feeling that I believe is widely experienced but not often documented and rarely addressed. We are having two big name contemporary music acts come to our campus with Maroon 5 and The Donnas appearing at the Mullins Center, so I felt it was time to talk about something I had noticed and I hope that you have noticed as well. Even if you are not into the concert scene, collective energy can be seen in a number of forms, as listed above.

People create music, people attend the shows of artists and people are the crucial element to collective energy at concerts and elsewhere. Whether the aim of music is political or social, for fun or for change, we are the ones who embody the power. The next time you are belting out your favorite songs and tapping your feet at a concert, look over at the next person doing the same activity and realize that both of you, and many others, are creating a passion that cannot be duplicated or imitated — the passion of collective energy.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

NEW INFORMATION ON LAW SCHOOL DEBATE

In response to S.J. Port's Column, "It's not the time for the law school," I would like to express my disappointment for the author's skewed and incorrect facts.

Though the column addresses the financial concerns about the desire to create a public law school, it ignores several very important points.

First, at the end of February, an independent site evaluation team (approved by the Massachusetts BHE) came to Southern New England School of Law with the intention of doing a full investigation. The site team consisted of former deans and financial advisers of some of most prestigious law schools in the world. After carefully reviewing the facts, the team said in its report "on balance, in our opinion, the merger of the School of Law and UMass Dartmouth presents very little financial risk for the University."

The team also cited that ABA accreditation will require a certain level of additional investment. However, the team suggested raising the budget slightly over $1.2M, which is no where near the $39 Million that Port cited (the board's report can be read at www.umassd.edu/law.)

That number Port quoted came from an independent report from a "gentleman" who was "paid" by Suffolk Law School, New England School of Law and Western New England School of Law to do nothing more than drag the SNESL and UMass names in the mud. This is a man who, when asked by BHE at the meeting last week if he would support the merger if an alumnus suddenly donates $39 Million dollars, he said, "No." His report was filled with inaccuracies and lies about the quality of the school and its financial stability. He was admittedly paid by the schools to create this report. This was not an independent report by any means.

Second and more importantly, the column is overlooking the need this state has for a public law school. Massachusetts is one of only six states in the country that does not have a public law school. Currently there is a crisis in this state to get public service law distributed to those in need. The proposed creation of the public law school will create serious tuition breaks for students who are willing to commit themselves to serving a career in public service.

I'm disappointed in Ms. Port's inadequate evaluation of the facts in this case. As a potential law student, it is imperative that she immediately learn to read more carefully. I urge her to rethink her comments and realize the amount of good this will bring to the state of Massachusetts.

These private institutions (Suffolk, New England and Western New England) have worked rigorously to smear the name of the University of Massachusetts and degrade the students of Southern New England School of Law. My classmates and I have been permanently hurt by their tactics. They aim to brainwash the citizens of Massachusetts into thinking that they care about the commonwealth enough to protect its taxpayers.

In reality these schools have just spent countless hours and thousands of dollars on protecting their own financial interest. This is money and energy that they should have been spending on their own students to better their education. And clearly Ms. Port has been victim of their brainwashing.

'Guess Who' deals race a dose of laughter

By Jake Monte
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Race is a very delicate issue — especially in America, because of our history of prejudice. To deal with it effectively in a film, the filmmakers are faced with a challenge. Say too much and the film will come off preachy and condescending. Say too little and it will seem glib and cowardly. It takes a special perspective to deal with the issue appropriately. The trick is to say something, but not too much, and to paint the whole picture without leaving some parts shaded and others bare. Most importantly, the characters should do the work. It's dreadful when we have to hear a speech at the end of the film as if the screenwriters are speaking directly to us.

"Guess Who," the Ashton Kutcher, Bernie Mac racial comedy, handles the subject exuberantly, never preaching, but always confronting. Screenwriters David Ronn, Jay Scherick and Peter Tolan, use characters so likeable that they endear us to the issue of race and make us want to face it instead of hiding from it. It's the awkward moments, intense glares and basic decency of the characters that give this comedy spirit. The film is very alive, shrewdly directed and never boring. But it operates at a steady decline.

The first half hour is non-stop laughs and as the film progresses the laughs come fewer and farther between. This is due to the screenwriters attempt to start to give the film a sentimental feel, but we miss the laughs, and the film loses heart instead of gaining it.

The film is about a young white man, Simon Green (Kutcher), who goes to meet his black girlfriend's parents, plated by Mac and Judith Scott. The girlfriend played by Zoe Saldana is a role model for African American's everywhere who are engaged in interracial relationships. She and Simon talk about everything and I have to say that for this reason, I thought the film an important one. There have been very few films made about modern day interracial relationships, and "Guess Who" is a welcome reminder that both partners in the relationship can get past the issue of race and be happy together.

Bernie Mac gives a wonderful performance as the father, Percy Jones. His intense look plays off Kutcher's fear in hilarious moments that will have you smiling from beginning to end. Along with the buddy comedy aspect of Kutcher and Mac, the film is so bold as to even include race jokes at the dinner table.

However, there is a basic theme of the film that is original and thoughtful. At one point Jones says to his daughter about the relationship, "Me telling you that it's okay is not going to change the world." To which she responds, "But it will change my world." That's as preachy as the film gets. The director, Kevin Rodney Sullivan, along with the screenwriters, have pulled off a delicate balancing act. Nothing about the treatment of race relations feels forced or false. But the film pushes the corny barrier a little towards the end which comes as shock to the audience and a disappointment because so much of the film is so good.

You may leave "Guess Who" feeling there is hope in a world that is still hung up on race and that someday people will laugh at "Guess Who" not just for the film's humor but because the race relations in the film are outdated.

Make the soundtrack to your life with these film favorites

The Mix Tape

Matt O'Rourke

How about a film where the soundtrack was better than the movie? If you've answered yes to any of the above, you will enjoy this week's tape.

"EYE OF THE TIGER" – SURVIVOR (3:48)

The "Rocky" films gave us all someone to be proud of - the little Italian guy who rose to the top. If there is anyone left who hasn't heard any of Rocky themes, I'd be surprised. This one hit wonder track features unforgettable in-your-face 80s style guitar syncopation, along with a steady downbeat. The track may get one hooked, and fans may find themselves listening to the whole song.

Have you ever seen a film where the music was so good that immediately after seeing it, you raced for the closest store to purchase the soundtrack? versus just the classic opener, where strong piano chords both stay in rhythm, and stray occasionally for independence effects. "Rising up back on street/did my time, took my chances"- lyrics everyone can relate to, and (obviously) great to start a workout regiment with.

"HEROES" – THE WALLFLOWERS (3:55)

It can be hard to avoid comparisons to members of your family sometimes, and its especially hard for children of famous celebrities. Jakob Dylan might not be his father (Bob Dylan), but that doesn't mean he can't still make great music. The Wallflowers' rendition of "Heroes" by David Bowie appeared on the "Godzilla" soundtrack- an instance where the soundtrack was far superior to the film. Overlapping guitars and dynamic integrity create a high quality pop-rock anthem. Bowie's song is about rising to the top, if only for a moment, and that's just what the Wallflowers did- they made a great impression on popular music.
(Sony 1998)

"LIVE AND LET DIE" – PAUL MCCARTNEY AND WINGS (3:13)

Paul McCartney may be one of the best pop songwriters of all time, but his music always provides depth to such a level that even the staunchest of music critics can't help but find themselves loving every moment of it. And to think, that Sir Paul's music was a theme for a Bond film (also of the same title), adds to his repertoire of excellence. Featuring strong horns, and a brilliant xylophone part, Paul McCartney never fails to please. The track is broken into movements (albeit very short ones), combining a rock band with an orchestra, and as signaled, with his singing of "live and let die", the track becomes as epic and as over-the-top as any Bond film.

"MY HEART WILL GO ON" – CELINE DION (4:38)

Perhaps one of the most overplayed tracks of the mid- to late-90s, Celine Dion's love anthem, "My Heart Will Go On" swept girls off their feet as they dreamed of their own personal "Jack." Strong vocals, combined with silent strings, flute, and bagpipes (among other Scottish instruments), all flow together to build a lasting, echoing love theme for James Cameron's blockbuster "Titanic." Dion's humming at the end is remarkably similar to a violin, edging off while the track fades. I'm sure many of heard this song at high school homecomings, spring flings, and proms. Believe it or not, this hit track has been even transformed by some bands into a punk-rock number- perhaps we can all find a way to love this track after all.

"STAYIN' ALIVE" – THE BEE GEES (4:47)

Go ahead, admit it. You once found yourself walking somewhere, or dancing to "Stayin' Alive." Hopefully you didn't pull something, or hurt passerbys in the process. That classic strut, inspired from the era of disco inferno, was one of John Travolta's many signature moves from "Saturday Night Fever." Still used as the classic "pimp" theme today by many, "Stayin' Alive" defines feel-good music. That impossible falsetto that the Bgees mastered remains atop the greatest pop vocal tracks ever recorded- many have tried to reproduce their sound, but nearly all have failed. So the next time you're walking around campus and see someone strutting while listening to their iPod- it's not unreasonable to guess that their listening to "Stayin' Alive."
(Polydor 1977)

"TIME AFTER TIME"- CYNDI LAUPER (4:03)

Eighties music is in the midst of a huge revival- good and bad tracks included, as new bands try to recreate such exceptional tracks. However, in terms of film, it may be better to just use the original track- as was the case in "Napoleon Dynamite." While "My Heart Will Go On" was the perfect prom song for the 90s, "Time After Time" was the 80s equivalent. A song that was made for the slow dance, "Time After Time" is ideal for formal dances.

"I DON'T WANT TO MISS A THING" – AEROSMITH (4:56)

It seems like it was only last summer where you could picture that video of Steven Tyler singing with orchestra, while scenes from "Armageddon" flashed back and forth. "I Don't Want to Miss a Thing" is a more masculine version of the theme presented in "My Heart Will Go On." Although this song was also very overplayed, upon re-listening to it now, one can easily appreciate how brilliant this track is. Incredible orchestration, accompanying a progressive melody and Tyler's emotional voice builds Aerosmith's hit into an incredible rock ballad. "I Don't Want to Miss a Thing" is well crafted, and can be appreciated on many levels- a track that is packaged for everyone.

New CD 'Angel' redeems Judas Priest after a 15 year absence

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Correspondent

After 15 long years Judas Priest has once again been blessed by the divinity of returning vocalist, "Metal God" Rob Halford on their newest offering, "Angel of Retribution." Not since his departure following 1990's "Painkiller" has the legendary metal band ever sounded so complete. Despite some valiant efforts from Priest-head turned front-man Tim "Ripper" Owens Judas' post-Halford efforts were missing that epic sound that has won them such a devoted fan-base.

Throughout the span of thirty-five years, Judas Priest has conceived gem after gem of classic metal but unlike so many other bands in the industry, age has not slowed them down one bit. The opening track "Judas Rising" bares testament to this undeniable fact. Halford erupts forth with a metal scream that is sure to slay all who doubt his supreme vocal power. Glenn Tipton and K.K. Downing are also on top of their game unleashing more of the guitar duels that metalheads have come to know and love.

"Angel of Retribution" is a solid album featuring something for every Judas Priest fan, from the classic sound of "Sad Wings of Destiny", to the metal assault of "Painkiller," and even a taste of "British Steel." Diehard fans will notice that allusions have been subtly hidden in the lyrics to these and other previous Judas Priest works. Among the outstanding tracks on the album are: the metal anthem, "Deal with the Devil," the apocalyptic "Hellrider," and the 13-minute plus epic "Loch Ness," a tribute to Scotland's legendary mythical creature.

Following the intense opening track, "Deal With the Devil" keeps up the pace with a heavy sound reminiscent of Priest's earlier years. Tipton, Downing, Hill and Travis pound out a steadily paced metal march while Halford propels the song forward with lyrics painting a history of the metal scene sung in his trademark power vocal style.

"Hellrider" is among the most intense of the new tracks, evoking images reminiscent of the metallic angel of destruction featured on the album's cover. This brutal piece is easily the most powerful indicator of Judas Priest's triumphant return. Set against a raging metal riff and supported with some fairly impressive drumming by Travis, sonic fury brings the Hellrider to life.

Perhaps the most intriguing track on the new album, "Loch Ness" blends dark melodies and mythical storytelling. The entire track is set at a brooding pace as Halford tells the mythical tale of the beast. Heightening the power of the legend, the chorus takes on the majesty of a national anthem. Towards the conclusion the lyrics begin to suggest that this sea beast is more than a mere Bigfoot but rather an eternal symbol of a lost time.

In addition to the new album, a bonus DVD is featured on the flip-side of the Dualdisc loaded with extras. The DVD features a documentary from the band that includes 7 live tracks from the "Reunited" tour of 2004. The entire album is also featured on the same DVD with enhanced stereo. As Rob Halford proudly proclaims, "Judas is Rising!"

"The Metal God" Rob Halford returns as lead vocalist for Judas Priest on their latest album "Angel of Retribution." Tim "Ripper" Owens replaced Halford in his absence.

Party off campus? Ask the attorney

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q: Now that spring is finally here we want to give a big party to celebrate. We live in a house in Amherst and are wondering what laws we should be aware of?

A: If you are hosting a party, you can be held liable for the actions of your guests so it is very important to make sure that the party does not get out of hand. Limit your guest list to a manageable number, preferably all people that you know. It is particularly important to control alcohol use because serving an intoxicated or disorderly person could result in substantial financial liability for the party hosts. Providing alcohol to a minor is a criminal offense punishable by a fine of up to $2000 and imprisonment for up to 6 months. It is important that you do not charge admission or sell drinks at the party because you could then be found guilty of selling alcohol without a license. If you want to serve beer from a keg, then it is necessary to apply to the police for a free keg license in advance of the party. Violation of the keg by-law will result in a fine of up to $300.

If you keep the party indoors, with windows and doors shut, you will better be able to reduce the noise. If the party is outside, make sure that your guests know that possession of open containers containing alcoholic beverages on any town street or sidewalk can result in a $50 fine and are aware that Amherst has a noise by-law. This regulation prohibits excessive, unnecessary, or unusually loud noise which annoys or disturbs others. Violators are subject to arrest and a fine of up to $300. For this reason, it is important to talk to your neighbors in advance of the party. You should let them know of your plans and ask that they contact you immediately If the party is disturbing to them.

Consider giving your neighbors a cell phone number to call if there is any disturbance, to best assure that you are aware that a complaint is being made. Otherwise, leave a note by the telephone advising guests to let you know if anybody calls during the party. If neighbors call to complain but are unable to speak directly to the host they usually make the next call to the police. An appearance by an officer means either a warning or a citation for a noise violation. Although cooperation with the police does not guarantee that you will only receive a warning, the lack of polite sober cooperation will assure you of the citation and could possibly result in your arrest. If at all possible, try to meet the officer outside and do not invite him or her into the house. During the party, it is recommended that the host monitor the sound level outside, and keep guests from gathering too close to the neighbors' windows. It is also a good idea to place trash containers in the yard to reduce litter, and to clean up any trash promptly after the party. Caution and proper planning can help to prevent party fouls and insure a problem free celebration.

Veteran artists drop the beats on NoHo

By Brian Duffy
Collegian Staff

New York underground veteran Aesop Rock and Bostonian wordsmith Mr. Lif headlined a hip-hop show at Pearl Street in Northampton on Tuesday night. This concert was part of a tour featuring artists from Definitive Jux, an independent hip-hop label founded by former Company Flow member, El-P. The night included performances by solo artist Rob Sonic and Metro, of SA Smash. The beats and mixing were provided by DJ Big Wiz.

When plus-sized Rob Sonic took the stage, this small Western Massachusetts venue was already packed. This Bronx native arrived on stage with a plain brown tee, dog tags, and a shaved head. There was nothing flashy about his exterior. He performed two moderately impressive tunes before being joined on stage by Columbus, Ohio rhymester, Metro. This SA Smash member brought an elevated energy level to the stage and the crowd immediately responded. Metro, who was clad in slightly more impressive garb, shared mic time with Rob Sonic. These two emcees were able to feed off the crowd and they became increasingly more impressive as they continued to perform. Rob Sonic, who initially was lackluster, garnered the respect of the audience by the conclusion of his performance. Metro had no difficulty gaining the appreciation of the crowd because of his energy and playful lyrics. Sonic is more of a no-non-sense lyricist, who relies on his calm approach to win over an audience. This opening act set the stage nicely for the evening's main event.

Aesop Rock and Mr. Lif arrived on the Pearl Street stage as the late Jimi Hendrix sang, "Well, I stand up next to a mountain and I chop it down with the edge of my hand." DJ Big Wiz was cheered enthusiastically as he spun this rock classic. This unexpected song only increased the crowd's excitement. Aesop Rock, dressed modestly in a white tee and a fitted cap, began rhyming like a man possessed. His eyes were wide as he meandered around stage, gazing out at the crowd as he delivered his complex commentary. He stalked the stage with an uncanny ability to align his mannerisms with the words he spoke, which were at times hard to decipher. This symbiotic expressionism was a rare spectacle. His tall lanky frame enhanced his imposing presence on stage.

Mr. Lif grinned warmly throughout his performance. He looked genuinely grateful to have the opportunity to share his talents with the crowd. Lif is a small guy with large dreadlocks, who wears glasses and does not dress lavishly. Mr. Lif motivated the crowd with his clever lyrics and quick delivery. Aesop Rock and Mr. Lif worked with DJ Big Wiz to form an impressively cohesive threesome. Both of these emcees looked to be comfortable as they poured out personal information to hundreds of people who they have never met.

Aesop Rock recently finished an album, "Fast Cars, Danger, Fire, and Knives." He performed the title track "Fast Cars," which is slated to be aired on MTV 2 in the near future. Aesop Rock sarcastically told the crowd that he is now "cool," because of the recognition he is receiving from mainstream outlets. This notoriety has been a long time coming for Aesop Rock, who has been making music since adolescence.

Mr. Lif just completed the album "Black Dialogue," the sophomore contribution from his collaborative project The Perceptionists. The Perceptionists also include Bostonians Akrobatik and DJ Fakts One. Mr. Lif performed some unreleased material off his upcoming 2006 solo project, including the song "Happy Halloween." He also did a tune that speaks to his uncertainty about having children in a chaotic world. Other subject matter included: globalization, the importance of showering, and the authenticity of his unique hair.

The show concluded with a rendition of "Daylight" by Aesop Rock. The crowd erupted as soon as the beat began. Most of those in attendance knew this tune by heart including the chorus, "All I ever wanted was to pick apart the day, put the pieces back together my way."

After the show, the performers sold their wares out of the back of their van. This allowed the crowd to purchase music for a reduced rate, converse with the MCs, and voice their appreciation and respect. These men are struggling artists who have to rely on old-school techniques to make ends meet. While on tour, they spend roughly six hours each day on the road.

Rob Sonic said that he enjoys being on the road, having toured Europe and Japan. This Definitive Jux artist, who recently released the album "Tellicatessen," said that he began writing and rhyming in middle school.

"We use to battle for lunch money," Rob Sonic reminisced. He first became interested in hip-hop music after hearing The Sugar Hill Gang and Run DMC. Currently, he claims to primarily listen to Definitive Jux emcees, but also enjoys Jay-Z and Nas.

Shutesbury resident Colin Jones, who is currently an undergraduate student at Oberlin College, was impressed by the show. "They talk about real life issues and what's really going on in their lives." Jones feels as if their music is a healthy alternative to the "bling" that is prominent in hip-hop music. "They bring a different style of rap that people don't know about," Jones concluded.

A fan named Amelia drove almost two hours from Albany to see the show. She was impressed by the sound inside Pearl Street. She said that Aesop Rock and Mr. Lif "worked off each other real well." She enjoyed seeing people having a good time and, "getting down."

Jacober's mind may not be in game tomorrow at Garber

The plane, also carrying Jacober's 49-year-old mother Karen, 15-year-old brother Eric, and three family friends, crashed in Benner Township, Pa. around 2 p.m. and killed all six aboard.

"The coaches and our program feel terrible about it," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Our thoughts and our hearts and our prayers go out to Mike and his family.

"[Jacober] is a really good athlete, good speed. He's a two-way middie who runs up and down and plays offense and defense. As the captain, he's got to be a pretty good leader in the program."

The Massachusetts lacrosse program has seen tragedy hit home before, as Eric Sopracasa, a 21-year-old junior midfielder, was killed when a ball hit him in the chest in practice during the 1999 season.

"In our issue a few years back, it was a focus issue for a lot of the guys to go back out on the field," Cannella said. "Our situation was a little bit different. I'm not saying it was any worse or any better. It's more about getting the guys to focus and going back to doing something you really love to do and play the game of lacrosse."

MATTHEW REED/COLLEGIAN

UMass goalie Bill Schell has been having a solid season in net for the 5-2 Minutemen, who will play Penn State tomorrow at noon.

Though the game may be an afterthought, it will still feature two of the biggest rivals in collegiate lacrosse, and Cannella's biggest concern for his Minutemen is that they are able to match Penn State's on-field intensity, especially as PSU will be entering the game with so much extra emotion.

"It's a great rivalry," Cannella said. "Penn State and UMass have played in a bunch of tight games. Last year was the only exception that wasn't a tight game (a 17-8 UM victory), and they'll come with a lot of emotion this weekend. They are a very athletic team, matching up with them athlete-to-athlete is difficult. They have a lot of experience. They have a good group of seniors leading their team right now."

NOTE: UMass junior attackman Sean Morris was added to the Tewaaraton Watch List on Tuesday. The Tewaaraton Trophy is given to college lacrosse's best player. Morris leads the ECAC with 2.71 goals per game and 3.43 points per game. UMass junior defenseman Jack Reid is also on the list.

NFL to discuss steroid issues

NEW YORK (AP) — The NFL and its players discuss changes in the drug policy every May. There could be a major proposal for them to talk about this year.

The NFL wants to upgrade its steroid testing program and get it back to the level set by the IOC, which recently upgraded its testing after new equipment became available.

Also, NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said the league seeks to add another testing lab and would like to test for human growth hormone when that is feasible.

"We have always adhered to the standard set by the International Olympic Committee," Aiello said. "Since the IOC has made its standards tougher, this was done to stay in line with it."

Under the old standard, a ratio above 6-1 of testosterone to epitestosterone, another natural hormone, was deemed to be a failed test. The new ratio adopted by the World Anti-Doping Agency is 4-1, one that the NFL proposes to implement. The most likely natural ratio of testosterone to epitestosterone in humans is 1:1.

Any change in the NFL's policy would require approval by the NFL Players Association. No date for a meeting with the players has been set, and Gene Upshaw, the union's executive director, did not return phone calls from The Associated Press on Wednesday. Upshaw, a staunch advocate of more stringent steroid testing, is vacationing in Hawaii.

Pro football clamped down on steroids more than a decade ago. For the last 15 years, the NFL has had one of the toughest steroid-testing programs in sports, with random testing, and with suspensions for a first-time failure. During that period, there have been 44 suspensions.

PARKING SERVICES REGULATION REMINDER
Effective Monday, April 4, 2005, Parking Services is returning to regular hours of parking enforcement. These hours are from 7:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., Monday through Friday. Valid UMASS parking permits are required in all parking lots, with the exception of metered lots. Metered lots are enforced for payment from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., Monday through Friday.
From 5:00 p.m. to 7:00 a.m., Monday through Friday, on weekends and on holidays, vehicles may park in any legal, non-reserved, non-restricted parking space or lot without displaying a permit. Reserved and restricted parking spaces or lots always require display of a proper permit. These spaces/lots include handicapped spaces, vendor spaces, state vehicle spaces and 24-hour restricted lots (specifically Lots 21, 22, 29, 35, 44, 47, 49, 50, 54, 64P, 67, North Village Apts. and Lincoln Apts.). Parking is never allowed in a tow zone or access lane. For more information, please visit our website http://parking.umass.edu or call Parking Services at 413-545-0065.

a pitching change by Dartmouth, scoring settled down for the Maroon and White until the sixth inning. After Stefanoni singled and Puglia was walked, Kelly hit a long ball to center field that drove in the final two runs of the game.

Dartmouth moved quickly in the second half of the doubleheader, with senior Jill Garcia hitting a homerun in the first inning off of UMass junior pitcher Jenna Busa to take an early lead. After a two-run inning, Busa did not give up another run for the proceeding six innings.

Following three scoreless innings against Dartmouth pitcher Angela Megaw, the Minutewomen began to play catch-up. Molinari started the comeback with a leadoff bunt-single. After Molinari stole to second, Denis was hit by pitch to put two on with two out. Freshman Lauren Proctor's only hit of the night was a significant one as she drove in two runs after knocking a single up the middle into center, tying up the ballgame. The defensive game continued, with neither team putting up any runs in the next three innings. UMass had an opportunity to pull out a win at the bottom of the seventh. With sophomore Amanda Morin and junior Kristi Stefanoni on base, the game came to an end, as the Minutewomen did not manage to stay alive.

"I just think our batting needs to get there when there's runners in scoring position," Kelly said. "We need to put the ball in play and not pop it up into the air."

The game ended after seven innings as darkness began to engulf the UMass Softball Complex. Busa (5-3, 2.54 ERA, 38 strikeouts on the season) ended the game giving up just four hits, two runs and struck out 14 batters, while LaDigg (8-6, 2.49 ERA, 89 strikeouts) gave up one hit and no runs.

most teams have specific areas of strength that they may be nationally recognized for. Teams LaFreniere sees as potential distance threats include top-rated Dartmouth and Boston College, while UMass-Lowell is seen as a primarily sprinting team.

The Minutewomen have a combination of rising newcomers and seasoned veterans. Juniors Elisabeth Budd (hurdles/sprints) and Christina Huff (sprints) have caught the eyes of their teammates, as well as LaFreniere. Huff won the 100-meter dash in the 2004 SCSU Invitational and finished second in the 200-meter dash.

"I think [Budd and Huff] are going to have very good seasons this spring," LaFreniere said. "They have certainly not been below the radar throughout the years."

Senior Marissa Kay Callahan (triple jump/hurdles) looks to complete her four years at UMass on a high note, as freshmen Ashley Davidson (distance) and Amanda Bodette (distance) look to end their rookie seasons with improvement.

"Amanda is really beginning to look good in workouts," LaFreniere said. "I could see a lot of improvement for Kay Callahan during the indoor season."

The first track and field meet of the season begins at 11 a.m. in New Haven, Conn. The Maroon and White placed third overall in last season's SCSU Invitational with 91 points.

With West Virginia on an unbelievable shooting tear, Pitino somehow kept the Cardinals within reach. He scrapped the 2-3 zone he'd been using to compensate for his team's lack of depth this season, told his players to press and trap and disrupt. The Mountaineers eventually cooled off, and the Cardinals (33-4) found themselves within a couple baskets.

And by the time overtime was winding down, Taquan Dean and Larry O'Bannon were celebrating and Louisville was winning going away.

"We've seen it all season from this team," Pitino said. "So many times, it looked like we were going to get knocked out. They're very resilient, very tough-minded and they're tough kids. I'm just a pussycat following their coattails. I just sit back and marvel at what they've accomplished."

Illinois (36-1) trailed Arizona by 15 with 4:04 left, then Bruce Weber's team staged one of the most stirring comebacks in tournament history.

Luther Head made a pair of 3-pointers and had a steal and layup to lead the rally. The Illini survived a tight overtime and made it to where they've been pointed since December, when they moved to No. 1 in the Associated Press poll — a perch they haven't been pushed from since, even when they lost their only game, to Ohio State on March 6.

"St. Louis has been the goal, but we've had that No. 1 for so long that that's been our outlook for the whole year," forward Jack Ingram said. "We want to bring this program to a level that no one else has ever done and winning some games in the Final Four will do that for us."

Also trying to break new ground is Williams, the Kansas-turned-North Carolina coach, who has accomplished virtually everything in college basketball except the national title. The Tar Heels (31-4) face Michigan State (26-6) in Saturday's second semifinal.

Larry O'Bannon waves the cut-down net to the Louisville fans in attendance after defeating WVU.

Tragedy hits PSU hard

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The white chalk that borders a lacrosse field doesn't just signify a player or ball that is inbounds or out of bounds. It isn't there just to show the players on the sidelines where to stand or the players on the field where to run.

But the chalk does create a blurry line that creates a superficial vision which turns these human beings into athletes and athletes back into human beings.

A fan out to watch a game will see the two teams battling it out for 60 minutes for the right to earn a simple tally in a win column that truly only exists on a piece of paper, whether it be in a conference office, a local newspaper or a coach's board.

What this fan doesn't typically see is that actual person who is underneath his protective helmet and gladiator-like pads. This fan doesn't tend to think of the player's schoolwork, social life or family atmosphere.

But these athletes are like the rest of us.

And beyond those chalk lines, they do face real-life adversity and, sometimes, even tragedy.

The No. 13 Massachusetts lacrosse team (5-2 0-1 ECAC) will face Penn State (2-4 1-0 ECAC) tomorrow at Garber Field at noon in a game that could be deemed virtually meaningless for one player and his family on the Nittany Lions' sidelines.

SCOTTISH REDDICK/COLLEGIAN

UMass attackman Bret Caretsky plays the ball against Brown earlier this season. The Minutemen play Penn State at Garber Field tomorrow at noon.

PSU senior captain Michael Jacober's parents and younger brother were all killed in a plane crash just six days ago. Jeffrey Jacober, Michael's 51-year-old father, was piloting a single-engine plane that was flying from Naples, Fla. to an airport near State College, Pa. to see his son's Nittany Lions play against Fairfield.

LaFogg flirts with perfect game as UMass splits two

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The crowd was on its feet as Massachusetts' senior pitcher Barb LaFogg was one out away from pitching a perfect game in the first dip of yesterday's doubleheader against Dartmouth. Although the game ended with a last-gasp hit by Dartmouth, the Massachusetts softball team (11-9-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) was able to tack one more win onto its season record and later tied Dartmouth in part two of the teams' doubleheader (3-7-1) yesterday.

Playing in the long-anticipated home opener, the Maroon and White shutout the Big Green in Game 1, 7-0 and then the two teams tied 2-2 in the second game of the afternoon. The tie ended UMass' streak of 73 consecutive regular season wins at home.

The Minutewomen get back into action tomorrow against conference foe Fordham, pending weather conditions.

"It's nice to finally play at home," coach Elaine Sortino said. "I'd like to improve on getting the ball in play a little more rather than popping it up."

The first game of the afternoon featured the Minutewoman defense, most notably LaFogg, who set a new record at the UMass Softball Complex. Throughout the seven innings, LaFogg did not allow a single run and gave up just one hit, while striking out 15 batters.

"It was there, in me for each pitch and each batter, so I felt pretty good," LaFogg said. "On a day like today, I felt like I could get anyone out that was up there, so that was how my mentality was for most of the game."

The 15 strikeouts were also a career best for the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week. LaFogg, who registered her first one-hitter of the season.

With the UMass pitching game shutting down virtually every Dartmouth batter, the Maroon and White offense took control of the scoreboard. Senior catcher KJ Kelly, who has been nursing an ankle injury, opened the gates for the Minutewomen with a sacrifice bunt that moved the UMass runners to scoring position.

"It's not 100 percent. I was able to go tonight so I was able to test it out," Kelly said. "I try to help my teammates out whenever they need me, and they asked me to come and play and I was ready. It's all about the team."

Senior Denise Denis, who leads the team in RBI with 18, brought in two runs with a single. The third inning led to the bulk of the runs for UMass, with nearly everyone getting in on the offensive attack. Sophomore Candice Molinari and Kelly each singled and freshman Stacy Cullington singled with the bases loaded. Freshman Lauren Proctor smacked to center field, followed by Kandice Morrin, who hit a RBI single to bring UMass ahead 5-0 going into the fourth inning. After

UM propelled by win over Wildcats

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

After a momentum-building, last-second 12-11 victory against a solid New Hampshire team on the road, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3-4) headed into this week of practice on a high note.

"Hopefully we're not too overconfident," coach Carrie Bolduc said. "You have to bring them back down and challenge them even more after a win. You have to be careful not too celebrate too much."

For a team that has been searching for a break through performance after a season of sweat and hard work, the victory on Saturday was exactly what the Minutewomen needed to break the ice.

"They worked for six games and then that seventh game they finally put together a total of 60 minutes," Bolduc said. "It was an example of what can happen. It was rewarding because they really worked hard for it."

The UNH game was back and forth the entire time, with UMass taking two-goal leads and UNH bouncing back. However, on this Saturday, the Minutewomen had an answer every time.

"This team is a bunch of fighters," Bolduc said. "They really don't give up. You can see it day to day in practice. When you challenge them they usually bounce right back, they respond."

The game ended with a last-second goal by Samantha Sepulveda with six seconds left in the game, as close as a buzzer beater in lacrosse can get, and the rarity of the event has energized the Minutewomen even more.

"It was very exciting for [assistant coach] Tracy [Drown] and I," Bolduc said. "And it was exciting to have the day off afterwards for Easter. The whole thing was fun and exciting, and it was fun to watch the girls be so excited. Winning in a one-goal game made it that much sweeter."

The Minutewomen returned to practice on Monday and have had a week to prepare for tomorrow's opponent, Boston College. UMass has had a hectic schedule in the last two weeks, and the week between games has not been a burden but a blessing for Bolduc's squad.

"We needed it," Bolduc said of the practice week. "We really needed this week to begin and focus on the Atlantic 10 games, focus on ourselves, doing some more attacking schemes and defensive schemes, things that we haven't been able to focus on because we've had to focus so much on winning or competing and playing in that next game. This week we've really been able to step back and focus on the small things we haven't been able to do. We have four games in the next week, starting Saturday with a big game Tuesday against Dartmouth. There's a lot of scouting to be done."

The coaches understand the importance of this upcoming stretch. It starts with a difficult road game against a Boston College team that is 5-2 on the season. BC lost to a ranked Boston University team 15-7 on Wednesday, the same team that handed UMass a 14-4 loss earlier this season.

BC will be another tough opponent on a brutal out-of-conference schedule. Bolduc is hoping that experience against tough opponents like BC will prepare the Minutewomen for the crucial conference games that start on April 8 against La Salle.

"BC is very similar to UNH," Bolduc said. "They're fighters, and that's competition that I like to play against. You can't let up. It's definitely going to help us for our A-10 games."

Minutewomen open up 2005 spring track season

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Rain, wind, thunder and lightening will all be factors this Saturday as the Massachusetts Women's Track and Field team participates at the SCSU Invitational in New Haven, Conn. Although the weather conditions will be unfriendly, it will not keep coach Julie LaFreniere's team from competing in the first outdoor meet of the season.

"I don't think I've ever had to cancel a track meet for weather," LaFreniere said. "Pole vault will most likely be contested indoors, but anything on the track will be outside."

The entire track season runs from fall (cross country), through winter (indoor track) and then to spring (track and field) without any elongated break in between, which calls for athletes who can withstand the nonstop stress that is put on their bodies. Training to run outdoors has shown to be a difficult task at times with the frigid climate and constant snowstorms. Since Garber Field is often plowed, it has been the place of many track practices to assist in the transition from indoor to outdoor track.

"We always use indoor as a springboard into outdoor track," LaFreniere said. "What we're asking our athletes to do is almost impossible. My whole caution is to not over extend the distance and to keep the mileage down."

Since the weather in New England can be unpredictable at times, the outdoor season starts late, forcing potentially fatigued runners to jump into the spring season without rest. LaFreniere is weary of the exhaustion experienced by her team and makes sure to not overdo any workout and to focus on leg turnover, rather than distance. LaFreniere understands that any team in the northeast region of America has to deal with the problem of weather, relieving the question of any disadvantage.

Besides UMass, other teams that will be competing under the downpour on Saturday include Fordham, Stony Brook and Southern Connecticut. Since track and field has so many components to it

Home stretch for college hoops

ST. LOUIS — Rick Pitino and Roy Williams. Over-achieving Michigan State and almost-undefeated Illinois.

The Final Four teams will have to put on quite a show if they're going to match the excitement of possibly the best NCAA tournament ever. But these marquee coaches and programs haven't had trouble entertaining thus far this tournament.

"I think it's the best ever," said Purdue's Gene Keady, one of the dozens of coaches who came to the Final Four city of St. Louis on Thursday. "The closeness of the games and how what they call the mid-majors really aren't mid-majors anymore. Anybody can beat you."

Vermont's upset of Syracuse and Bucknell's shocker over Kansas defined the first crazy week, and the madness continued into an even more dramatic set of regionals.

Three regional finals went into overtime, the first time that's happened. The opponents in Saturday's first semifinal, Illinois and Louisville, each overcame double-digit deficits to force overtime and advance.

"These young people, under the influence of pressure, how they accomplish what they accomplish is amazing," Pitino said.

Pitino became the first coach to lead three different programs — Providence, Kentucky and Louisville — to the Final Four, and there's no denying his touch on the bench

Bruschi still upbeat

SMITHFIELD, R.I. (AP) - Six weeks after a stroke, linebacker Tedy Bruschi visits the New England Patriots' headquarters daily, coach Bill Belichick told a group at Bryant College.

"He comes in regularly. He's there everyday," Belichick said Wednesday night during a motivational speech to a crowd of 1,300.

"It was a serious situation, and he's getting better," Belichick said, according to the MetroWest Daily News of Framingham, Mass. "Tedy is Tedy. He's an upbeat guy. He has a smile on his face like he always does."

There has been little information released publicly about the 31-year-old's condition since he left Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston on Feb. 18.

His wife, Heidi, had called 911 two days earlier, saying her husband was experiencing "blurred vision, numbness on the right side of his body."

There has been no word from the team or the family on whether Bruschi will resume his football career.

Beloved Minuteman mascot kills 3 in bloody rampage

by DICK TRICKLE
Collegian Staff

In what police officials have described as "Son of Sam, part deux," University of Massachusetts mascot Sam the Minuteman, assisted by convicted drug dealer Mr. Slice, murdered three theater guild members last night with a musket.

"When I first saw all those nuts running around like that, I originally thought that someone forgot to lock the doors at the psychiatric hospital," said a police officer who asked not to be accountable for anything that was said while he devoured a Boston kreme donut.

"I later realized that it was just another theater guild production — same shit, different day, right?"

Early reports from police say that the theater guild had been practicing its latest rendition of the failed broadway musical "Seussical." Theodore Gueissel, a native of Springfield, would surely be ashamed to see the guild set a new record for failing at remaking failures.

Found at the scene was a piano, a tuning fork that remained in the box, and two suspicious assailants identified as Thing 1 and Thing 2.

When police attempted to arrest members of the guild, one frantic suspect shouted, "I will not go to jail. I will not, will not, post the bail. I will not eat green eggs in the can. I will not eat green eggs, Sam I am."

The character would later admit to being a Sam, Sam the Minuteman.

"Hey, what do you expect," Sam asked. "We've hit some hard times for sports here. My job isn't that easy. Besides, what the hell? I'm a Minuteman. I was in a goddamn ESPN commercial. You don't give your mascot a gun and not expect shit to hit the fan every once and a while."

Though the true story is not in the crime, but more the man, the "Minuteman." Minuteman was neglected by his father as a small child, leading him to run away from home at the early age of 15.

"I kill because I hurt," said Minuteman in an interview with the Morning Wood in 1996. "My dad never hugged me."

In 1997 Sam met his estranged sister, Pam the Minutewoman, just hours after the two had made what Sam referred to as "sweet kwin" in a Mullins Center restroom.

"Hey, you don't just ask every chick if she is your sister you know," Sam said. "All I know is she had dumps like a truck, and thighs like what if you know what I am sayin'"

Nine months later, the two welcomed a baby boy in to the world, Dan the Minuteman (baby).

In 2000, Sam was incarcerated for dealing over two bags of grass, seventy-five pellets of mescaline, five sheets of high-powered blotter acid, a saltshaker half-full of cocaine and a whole galaxy of uppers, downers, screamers and laughers out of the trunk of his 1997 lipstick red Dodge Stratus. Pam has reportedly been seen walking up and down the streets of Amherst in scarce clothing.

"You want me to do what for $20," said Pam in an undercover interview with The Morning Wood. "Not even my mouth is that big," she added.

Unfortunately, the interview ended abruptly when Pam crapped her pants.

Sam the Minuteman was a well-known and loved symbol at UMass. Last night he crossed in to the dark side of UMass history.

Adam in a 'hairy' situation

Original Skank

Adam

I didn't realize what I was getting into.

Here I was sitting in class when all of a sudden she walked up to me. The girl I had been staring at nonstop since the very first day of the semester. I could hardly believe my luck. I had just gotten out of the gym, I had decided to go for a quick work out in between classes. I probably smelt like a jock strap, but I knew I couldn't panic. This could be the big day.

As she walked toward me, I tried to act like I didn't know she was coming, but the closer she got, the more in-focus she appeared and it was suddenly all too clear that this girl had a serious mustache that was apparently undetectable with the usual distance from my seat to hers.

Do not get me wrong, I love all different kinds of ladies. Blond barbies, stacked bru-nettes, long legged raven hairs, journalism geeks, you name it, they all have my heart. But a lip hair wearing homegirl?

"Hey," she said as she stopped in front of my seat — the very last one in my aisle of the five-hundred seat lecture hall. "I was wondering if you wanted to study with me tonight. You know, since we have that big test coming up tommorow."

A test! What am I here for? I do not pay thousands of dollars a semester to have a test creep up on out of nowhere like that. I hadn't studied a single page since our last exam.

I quickly analyzed my options. On one hand, I thought, I could blow this chick off and tell her I've got it under control. I would be free from uncomfortable silences or any accidental staring directed at her unfortunate facial feature. But I would probably fail my test.

Or, if I could just buck up and handle it, I could study with this girl, get a decent grade, and maybe learn a thing or two about a person's inner beauty.

But I never do that, because everyone knows inner beauty is a crock of shit. After much liberation, I decided my GPA/funding from my mothers hank account is far more important that an upset stomach for a few hours, so I told her I'd meet her in the Cape Cod Lounge around 5:30 p.m. that night.

I walk in, and there she is on the other side of the room looking pretty good in a cute little pajama number. She waves to me, and I acknowledge her with that little nod of the chin that we guys do to signify we see you, but you aren't important enough to have any extraneous muscle movement. She is all smiley, and truth be told, I just feel bad because she doesn't realize she has a moustache.

I sit down on the couch with her and we crack open our books. After some studying she asks me if I feel like making a trip to the Blue Wall. I think to myself, this hasn't been so bad, hanging out with this girl, but can I actually keep food down around her?

Again, I give her the benefit of the doubt and we make our way down to the fine dining establishment otherwise known as the Blue Wall. After making our food choices, we head out to the cafeteria and pick a seat where it is kind of quiet.

As I unwrap my burrito I realize that she is not only talking to me in a breathy whisper, but moving her foot up and down my calf. This is awkward.

She starts to tell me how shes been noticing me looking at her in class and shes been waiting for us to get alone together. I'm truly confused. What is it with women? The ones you want won't give you the time of day, and the ones with hairy lips are all coppin' a feel under the table. Something is seriously wrong with that.

I quickly shove the burrito into my mouth, gigantic bite after gigantic bite. In no time I have completely devoured the entire football-sized chicken wrap. I tell her I've forgotten that I left my iron on in my room and need to go turn it off. She looks a little disappointed, and I almost feel bad, but I don't want to lead her on, right?

I pick up my things and tell her thanks for the homework help, and run out pretty much at the speed of light. In fact, I ran all the way to my room. Once inside, I put down my books and sat at the computer to gather my thoughts. I mulled over all the events of the evening and drew one basic conclusion. I will never try to find "inner beauty" again.

Mamma Rosa Busted !

Mamma Rosa, pizza legend of Blue Wall fame, was arrested yesterday on charges of possesion with intent to deal. Rosa, whose real name is Shady McDeal apparently had over 30 pounds of high-grade marijuana stashed in the Famiglia Pizza kitchen. When caught with the illegal drugs, McDeal said that the drugs were organo to spice her pizza. Police immediately distinguished this as a lie because we all know that Blue Wall pizza is nasty.

terback] Paul Peterson sucks. He just does. Don't compare him to me. That spaghetti-armed fairy is no Doug Flutie. No one is. Did you see my Hail Mary to beat Miami? I threw that ball at least 80, maybe 100 yards downfield. Watch the replay. I'm freakin' good, man. If I were walking down the street, I wouldn't know Paul Peterson from a giant, uncircumsized dildo.

"And the basketball team? I haven't seen a team choke like that since Nate Kaeding blew that 40-yard field goal in overtime against the Jets in the playoffs. If my name were Craig Smith or Jared Dudley, I'd probably give my testicles to someone who will actually use them. Wisconsin-Milwaukee? Sweet job, guys.

"Oh, and then there's the hockey team. Best team in the country heading into the NCAA tournament, and they get bullied around by North Dakota. It serves them right. I haven't seen so many girly-men — as Governor Schwarzenegger would say — in the same room since I played in the Canadian Football League.

"The thing that kills me with them is Ryan Shannon and Patrick Eaves pull more tail than Kobe Bryant. But then again, the BC girls are the fakest gold diggers I've ever come across, and that's saying something because I just spent four years in San Diego."

It was definitely clear through his statements what LMS can do to a human being, as his verbal abuse stopped at no one, not even a well-wishing mother of four who also works with Flutie's charity, The Doug Flutie Jr. Foundation for Autism, whom Flutie dimed as a "two-cent whore" and a "greasy slam pig" among other things.

UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon was on staff in the Boston College athletic department during Flutie's years at the school, and he was also at the press conference yesterday.

"Under any other circumstances, for anyone else, I would feel horribly for that person suffering from Little Man Syndrome and their family," McCutcheon said. "But that jerkoff isn't worth anything more than the sweat that drips off my scrotum on a hot summer's day. He used to make fun of me everyday when we were at BC. He had this nickname for me. 'Hey, DSL, go get me a bottle of water,' he would say. I didn't even know what 'DSL' meant, but you can bet I'm going to start calling him 'LMS' from now on. 'LMS', for 'Loud Mouth Shithead'."

Things got really hairy after the press conference ended, and Flutie called out Boston College Associate Athletic Director Chris Cameron for not accommodating his personal needs. Cameron, clearly a fat piece of worthless, freeloading, inbred, donkey shit, is a prime target for someone suffering from LMS.

"Hey, Cockring!" Flutie shouted at the overweight Kentucky native. "I've never seen someone screw up a press conference so badly in my life. Go write another book about Rick Pitino, you ass-kissing, Drew Carey look-alike. You are about as professional as the dingleberries that stick to the inside of my colon. Blow me, you twice-recycled condom!"

Lost in the midst of this trying day was the despair on the faces of the most loyal group of bandwagoning pussies to ever grace this maroon and gold earth, the BC SuperFans.

Whether they are watching championship hopes of their beloved athletic teams pop like the zits on Jason Giambi's acne riddled back, cruising around Newbury Street in their flashy and expensive cars that only say one thing: "I have a small penis," or crying over their sacred leader's newfound condition of LMS, these SuperFans will superficially hold their heads high while rocking their gold tee shirts six days a week.

Because after all, they're rich bitches.

And when I say, "rich," I mean, "giant."

And when I say, "bitches," I mean, "pussies."

former New York Mr. Basket-weaving in 2000 and 2001, Ray-Ray led the Minutemen in scoring (15.4 points per game), rebounding (7.8 per game), field goal percentage (53.8%), free-throw percentage (64.8%), Freudian slips (eight per press conference) and head-first dives into the stands when the other team is running towards the basket (one per nationally-televised game).

"We are going to miss him a lot, obviously," teammate Jeff "Big Deli" Salowki said. "He did a lot of stuff to help this team out, on and off the court, like, uh...Hey, is that a ring ding you've got there? Mind if I...wait nevermind, that's just your tape recorder. Damn, I haven't ate in like 20 minutes. Get outta my way, I'm starving!"

So far, the Atlanta Hawks are the only team to express any remote interest in the 6-foot-9 forward, and even then it is minimal interest.

"The man has a lot of passion," Hawks general manager Imgunna Gitcand said. "But in all fairness, we're a little concerned about his academic performance. I mean, if you can't pass Jim Harrick, Jr.'s class, what does that say?"

Ray-Ray has hired Wesley Spears, the former agent of Marcus Camby, as his agent for the upcoming draft.

"If anyone has an uncoiled wire hanger, would you mind lending a brother a hand?" Spears apparently said when approached by a couple of Knight Ridder reporters and a bookie. "I need to go to sleep soon, and I accidentally locked my 1977 Ford Pinto with the keys inside. Oh yeah, about Ray-Ray. Um, he's pretty cool or something like that. Never actually met the guy. Go Nuggets!"

Asked about his feelings concerning the possibility of him playing for the shittiest organization in all of sports, Ray-Ray was ecstatic.

"Oh man, this is a dream for me, this ain't even happening right now. I got to watch it on SportsCenter again to make sure it's real," he said. "The thought of me playing with dudes like Dominique Wilkins, Spud Webb and Antoine Walker really makes me want to jump into a crowd of college kids with four seconds left on the clock. I like the pretensity those guys show on the court."

Ray-Ray is still living on campus, due to the fact that he forgot to withdraw from all his classes when he made his decision. For now, he is stuck dealing with the difficulties of Harrick, Jr.'s exams, but remains very optimistic — an attitude reflected by at least one member close to the Hawks' pathetic organization.

"We were informed recently that Freeman had stressed in several press conferences about the need for overcoming diversity," team towel-boy Hugh Jass said. "I think most of our guys are African-American, so that shouldn't be a problem.

"He had also spoke repeatedly of maintaining exposure. Altho-ugh we only average about 50-someodd fans a night and the local community access channel just dropped our coverage, there's still a lot of hope that the fans in this city will eventually, one day, give a shit."

Garden chokes under pressure

By MARV ALBERT
Pete Mt

At last night's Boston Celtics game at the New Garden, legendary Celtics player/coach/broadcaster Tommy Heinsohn strangled and killed NBA referee Joe Crawford.

After a hideous call against Celtics superstar Paul Pierce, Heinsohn (known for his constant jarring at the refs) leaped over the courtside piling and began his assault on Crawford's collar bone. The choking went on for 20 seconds before the players were able to pry Heinsohn off the lifeless ref.

Heinsohn has had a history with NBA officials throughout his career. Although only one of three coaches in Celtic history to win the coach of the year award (1972), and leading the Celtics to two NBA championships during his eight year reign as coach, Heinsohn's impeccable basketball record has been tarnished over and over again by his bouts with referees.

His first year of coaching in 1970 marked the beginning of these ridiculous outbursts, when Heinsohn threatened to burn down the house of NBA referee David Shaw whose wife and children happened to be sitting right behind Heinsohn when he made the remark. After winning his first NBA coaching championship in '74 Heinsohn took the microphone on national television and gave, not an acceptance speech, but a vulgar tirade about how the refs were in on some conspiracy to take his towel away while he was showering in the locker room. One could relate to the fear, but unlike the rest of the coaches Heinsohn never kept his emotions in check.

Long time announcing partner Mike Gorman chimed in on Heinsohn's developing condition with NBA officials after the outburst last night.

"They took him away in a straight jacket," Gorman said. "It was really awful. I've never seen Tommy like this. He's in really bad shape. I followed him to the emergency room; the nurses there all looked spooked. He kept yelling, 'You got to get Antoine down on the box!!! What's he doing out there???...RUN! RUN! RUN!'. I mean, the guy lives for basketball, but I think we need to find a therapeutic solution here."

Gorman was not the only one voicing his concern. Legendary Celtic coach/general manager Red Auerbach came into the emergency room to pay his friend a visit. The nurses told Auerbach to put his cigar out, but before they could extinguish it, water shot down from the ceiling as the fire alarm rang through the hallways.

It was later reported that while Heinsohn lay there in his straight jacket doused in water from the alarm overhead, the water falling down from the ceiling, reminiscent of the champagne lathering after championships, sent Heinsohn into flashbacks of his playing days that often ended in shouts of "Give him a Tommy Point!" or "the refs are giving the other team EVERY chance to win this ballgame!"

All of the Celtic old-timers showed at the hospital to give Heinsohn their support including some of the greatest Celtics of all: Larry Bird, Kevin McHale and Robert Parish. The Chief showed up with a Bob Marley shirt on and beads in his hair, leading everyone to believe the suspicion that he was fond of the cheeba during his playing days.

Heinsohn was let out of the hospital early this morning after a long night of tossing and turning. He walked out the front door with his hair frazzled, his Hawaiian shirt unbuttoned and flowing in the wind. Another man walking into the hospital handed him a dollar as he walking out.

"I'm embarrassed," Heinsohn said to the throng of reporters. "But that was just...a terrible call that that guy made. I just blew a fuse. And I don't even know how I got over that booth and got onto the court; at my age that's amazing. Mike tried to hold me back but he just couldn't do it. I was determined to get that guy baby! By the way.....did the Celts win the game?"

Tommy Heinsohn and Dr. J share an awkward moment before Dr. J leaves him for the salad bar.

Heinsohn's venture onto the Garden floor has triggered a flurry of similar incidents, including an episode with the Celtic himself: Red Auerbach.

Red, after seeing the Southwest Airlines "dancers" come out to do their halftime dance-off, went out and tackled one of the male cheerleaders in the middle of one of their tosses. The girl who was airborne while this was taking place hit the floor hard but only suffered mild bruises.

"It was absolutely ridiculous," Auerbach said while blowing smoke into the camera. "These antics that they put on during timeouts and halftimes are way over the top. It's not about the game anymore. Even though we were the last team in the NBA to have cheerleaders, I at least thought that they would've waited until I was dead."

Auerbach's punishment was similar to Heinsohn's, even though Heinsohn's case was much more severe. Both men were locked in a dark room and forced to watch game tapes of the Laker championships in 2000, 2001 and 2002.

Smash from Demolition, the third was Goldust. McCutcheon was visibly moved with the news.

"I don't understand it, they were all good men." McCutcheon said as he walked towards the window in his office, wiping his eyes. "It seems every time I fire someone they go to professional wrestling, I can't believe Steve went. I loved that man... I loved him real good."

McCutcheon then shut his curtains, turned to the reporter in the room and yelled, "None of this leaves the room! N-O-N-E!." He then walked to his desk, put his head down and clicked his intercom to talk to his secretary. "It happened again Thorr, damnit it happened again."

He then lifted a lone linger to the door and told the reporter to leave, back heaving and visibly crying.

When Lappas heard of McCutcheon's reaction, his painted face started glowing. He did a full somersault, jumped in the air and screamed, "Whippity, Skippity, Dooo!" He then honked his nose approximately seven times before giving his first comment.

"Oh that's what Johnny boy did huh? Well let me tell you somethin' Mean Gene I want Johnny boy in the ring with me as soon as possible." Doink (Lappas) said. "If he wants a little of the Doinkster, I wouldn't mind rubbing some face paint all over his cravat. That's French for necktie you bitches."

Just when it all appeared to be over, "We Built this City on Rock and Roll," started to play and McCutcheon came out in purple and pink tights. Doink (Lappas) saw him from across the other side of the gym and pointed in his direction, teeth clenched, green hair flowing in the wind.

"This one's just beginning Steve," McCutcheon yelled before disappearing into smoke.

"Oh you know this Johnny... come give daddy a kiss," Doink (Lappas) said.

Maroon and White squad that finished 6-5 last season and looks to bring his power-style of running to coach Don Brown's crew. Although his track record appears somewhat shaky to critics, friends have vouched that Williams' ability to bull over defenders outshines his off-field troubles.

"Ricky can really light it up out there, that man will smoke anyone," friend and rock star Lenny Kravitz said. "He also smokes a lot of pot."

Although Williams is definitely on his way to UMass, it was not his first choice of schools to attend. When deciding what step to take after traveling the world, Williams reportedly informed Leigh of his interest in attending Vermont because of the "excellent social activities they offer," but Leigh quickly informed Williams that UVM was not an option.

"It was apparent to me that Ricky was disappointed that UVM did not have a football program," Leigh said. "However, it is not an issue as of now."

As an athlete, the former first-round pick in the NFL draft will also be a member of the UMass student body, where he will study Philosophy.

"I cannot wait to get back onto that shiny green field," Williams said. "If there is anything I miss, it's the grass on the field. When I left football, I learned how much that grass means to my life."

Throughout the press conference, Williams shared his own ideas for the upcoming season. His insight included such suggestions as changing the UMass fight song to "One Love," by Bob Marley and watching "Bill and Ted's Bogus Adventure" every once and awhile in the film room. The press conference concluded with five minutes of what Williams called "meditation time," followed by "happy time," then "Ricky time" and finally "Pink Floyd time."

The one point that Williams stressed repeatedly during the press conference was that despite a "quick trip to Europe or Asia every once and a while," he will "not retire from football at any point during the season."

On Sept. 1, Williams will take the field (or grass) against Atlantic 10 foe Richmond in hopes of reviving his once illustrious career.

Minutemen score a sweet J

By AUNT JEMIMA
YEP, THE SYRUP LADY

Look for the Massachusetts men's basketball team to be much improved next season. It was announced earlier this week that Julius "Dr. J" Erving has one more year of eligibility left and will return to the school for next season.

The news of Erving's return comes just one week after UMass announced that Travis Ford will be taking over the program. It has been said that the hiring of Ford is what compelled Erving to return to the Minutemen.

"I think Coach Ford and myself can really bring this program back to the NCAA Tournament," Erving said at the press conference announcing his return.

Erving hasn't played college basketball since 1971 but will instantly become the best forward on a team that went 16-12 during the 2004-05 season. Ford says that in order to make room for Erving in the starting lineup, the most likely scenario is that sophomore Rashaun Freeman will be moved to the bench.

"Julius gives us an instant improvement at the forward position," Ford said. "I can't wait to see his high flying antics back in action."

Even ESPN college basketball analyst Dick Vitale is excited about Erving's return to hoops.

"This is awesome baby," Vitale exclaimed. "The return of Dr. J to Amherst is the best news basketball has heard since the introduction of the shot clock baby! He's a diaper dandy, a high flyer, a show stopper..." Vitale then proceeded to rattle off a laundry list of compliments that can barely be distinguished as English.

Erving will fortify a UMass starting five that will include himself, freshman Jeff "Big Deli" Salowki, junior Jeff Viggiano, sophomore Art Bowers, and freshman Lawrence Carrier.

"I'm most excited about playing alongside 'Big Deli'," Erving said. "If both of us play to our potential UMass could be cutting down the nests next April."

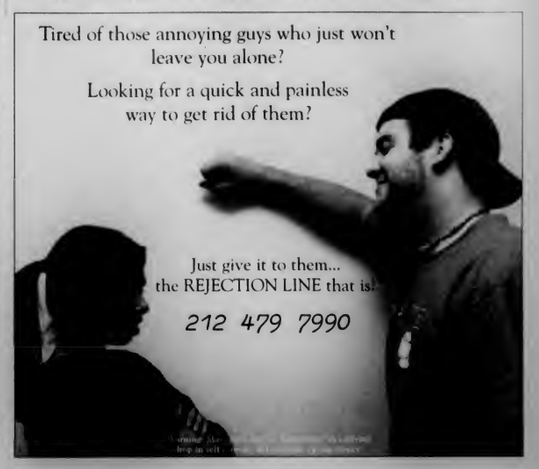
Erving's prediction may not be that far off judging by the way he played for the Maroon and White nearly 35 years ago. He still holds, and will look to build upon, 14 UMass records. Erving's accolades include most career points (1,370) and career rebounds (1,049).

Some question if Erving can still play at his old age. These skeptics may be right with him being halfway to 100 and not having played basketball at this level since his retirement from the NBA in 1987. There's no wavering Erving's confidence however.

"Please, I'm insulted by that question," Erving defiantly exclaimed. "Look at me, I'm in the best shape of my life."

At this point some reporters in the room cringed as Erving proceeded to take his shirt off and do his best Arnold Swarchenegger pose. There was serious doubt about his shape but no one wanted the question the man who was going to bring the Minutemen back to national prominence.

"This guy is the future of basketball here in Amherst," Ford giddily exclaimed as he squeezed the bicep of Erving.



There is one hitch to Erving becoming the new (and old) face of the Maroon and White. Freeman is not happy about being benched in favor of what he called a "gray haired geriatric."

"Man I can't believe you are all so stupid to think this is actually going to work," Freeman said as he grabbed the microphone from Erving's wrinkled hands. "Look at the guy, he's older than father time, I'll beat him with one leg tied to my ass."

It is hard to tell whether or not Erving and Freeman will be able to co-exist on the same team. Coach Ford made it clear that Erving will be playing 35 to 38 minutes a night.

"Julius is the kind of player that could play the entire game, especially with the shape he's in," Ford said as he once again squeezed Erving's bicep. "Rashaun will be lucky if he even gets a warm-up next season."

Travis Ford may only have to worry about team chemistry next year as the talent part is taken care of now that the doctor is in, once again in Amherst.

Steve ready to sLAPPASs

By "Mean" Gene Okerlund
Special to the Collegian

Steve Lappas' search for a new job is officially over.

Only a few weeks after getting canned by the University of Massachusetts, Lappas has come into an agreement with Vince McMahon, the owner of the world renowned WWE (World Wrestling Entertainment) to become the newest version of Doink the Clown.

Doink, who was a well-received wrestler during the mid to late 90s, has been a character that the WWE has wanted to bring back ever since T.C. Reynolds (his former actor) hung up the clown shoes. Lappas was adamant that it was too hard to pass up such an opportunity and is pleased that he can finally realize his lifelong dream.

"I always wanted to be a wrestler, no doubt, but at the same time I wanted to be a clown too." Lappas said in full makeup. "UMass didn't let me play with the coaching position like I wanted to. I asked 'Can I wear a wig?' they said 'No!' I asked 'What about the lipstick?' yea, well that's where the conversation used to end."

After confronting the press who were on hand to witness his first day on the job, Lappas got into his tights and started working on his moves. 'The Whoopie Cushion,' was a favorite maneuver by Doink in yesteryear and Lappas has been working his buns to the bone to perfect it.

The move requires Lappas to run, bounce off the ropes, and go airborne long enough to outstretch his legs and sit on his opponent's face. As reporters looked on, Lappas called for the move, honked his horn twice, and plopped every ounce of Lappas tushy on the hard rink floor. He then shot up, writhing in pain and yelled, "Holy jeepers that was a stinger!"

Although all appears to be well in the WWE and for Lappas, Reynolds is none too pleased with the Doink alias being brought back to life.

Sitting in his one bedroom apartment in Detroit, MI, Reynolds has resorted to alcohol and marijuana and is still holding on to his days in the ring. When asked about Lappas taking his job, Reynolds looked up from his 40 oz and let loose.

"What? They gave Doink to someone else?" Reynolds said as he stumbled off his couch into the kitchen. "Screw that man, I was the king back then. People remember me, people respect me. When I go to the bar they always say, 'Oh man it's Doink again,' that's called respect my friend. Now if you will good sir, pass me a napkin, I have to shit."

Amidst the hype surrounding newly-hired head coach Travis Ford, John McCutcheon was briefly available for comment.

McCutcheon sat at his desk expecting questions about Ford, when a picture of Lappas in the clown costume was dropped on his desk. McCutcheon looked, did a double take, and began crying, mumbling the words, "not again Johnny boy, not again."

Apparently Lappas is the fourth coach that McCutcheon has turned into a professional wrestler after a firing. The first two were Axe and

UMass SPORTS IN BRIEF

"No Gabe Winer Jokes Since 2004"

UMass Director of Athletics John McCutcheon was recently honored as the latest recipient of the prestigious "Did You Really Say That Shit Out Loud At a Press Conference?" Award, given annually to the executive or administrator who most exemplifies the spirit of being completely classless in a public forum.

McCutcheon was honored for the well-thought-out comment he made at new Minutemen coach Travis Ford's introductory press conference, in which he stated that he began searching for a coach to replace Steve Lappas in the middle of the team's season.

"We want to commend John McCutcheon for his comment," former winners John Chaney and Bobby Knight said in joint statement. "He has clearly made all of the current coaches on the UMass campus very secure, and will undoubtedly be able to attract other promising coaches to Amherst in the future with the fact he displayed."

In related news, McCutcheon plans to speak at a National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) seminar on how to form a successful coaching search committee.

Among the topics that McCutcheon will be asked to touch on are, "How to Make Sure All Your Boys Are on the Committee Without Anyone Objecting," and "Token Minority Members: Why Professors and Coaches Who Have No Free Time to Actually Help Are Right For Your Committee."

Citing budget cuts, university officials have announced that they will no longer fund the baseball team's annual trip to Florida. Coach Mike Stone's club will now be encouraged to get their asses handed to them every day on beautiful Earl Lorden Field instead.

After receiving a substantial monetary donation from the "Friends of UMass Football" organization, University Health Services has secured the necessary funds to expand its facilities, and will break ground on a new wing within the next month.

The new unit will specialize in puncture wounds and lacerations, and will feature an expansive waiting room capable of handling up to 100 people.

"The football program has grown tired of having its players shipped to other hospitals every time they take a switchblade to the face," project director Robert J. Montgomery said. "We will now be able to treat them here on campus, as well as accommodate up to 100 of the bitches and hoes they bring with them."

UMass freshman forward Lawrence Carrier was seen shattering a backboard at Boyden Gym with a dunk earlier this week, dispelling a rumor that he hasn't gotten to the rim since arriving in Amherst.

Perplexed by his team's struggles over the course of the recently completed 2004-05 season, UMass hockey coach Don "Toot" Cahoon distributed a survey to members of the local Western Massachusetts media asking what he could have done differently over the course of the year.

Having compiled the results over the past week, Cahoon was distressed to learn that every survey featured the answer, "not been such an asshole to us every time you read something you didn't approve of" written across each page.

Neither Cahoon nor Ali Darcy, the team's official spokeswoman, was available for comment on the surveys at press time.

Former UMass basketball player Brennan Martin became the first senior who failed to graduate under Steve Lappas in the coach's career when he failed off the team during the season, adding "study" to the list of things Martin failed miserably at doing – a list that also includes running, jumping, dribbling, passing, shooting, rebounding, defending, setting screens, boxing out, moving without the ball and NOT wasting a scholarship, among other things.

Football coach Don Brown has assured incumbent starting quarterback Tim Day that despite the arrival of transfer Taylor Humphrey and the presence of talented freshman Liam Coen, he will have a legitimate chance to earn the position again next year. Seriously.

Clearly frustrated after a third consecutive disappointing season and a second late-season collapse in three years, women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko recently took out her frustrations on an amateur reporter, refusing to answer his questions and asking for him to be removed from the beat immediately after he posed an uninformed question to her at a recent press conference.

Meanwhile back on planet Earth, no one gives a shit about women's basketball, amateur reporters make up two-thirds of the credentialed press at every one of her team's games and not only will she NEVER have any input on who any of them are, but she should consider herself lucky that they put in the time and effort that they do on her team's behalf. Period.

While speaking at his first press conference as the new coach of the Minutemen, Travis Ford declared that he was "excited to be part of a school with a rich basketball tradition like UMass."

Later that night, he then reportedly realized that the team has been awful for roughly 20 of the past 25 seasons.

Don't worry, it's just a little prick

I'm Not Really Dead

CHESTNUT HILL, Mass. — At a press conference on the 50-yard line of Alumni Stadium, Boston College alum and giant dickhead Doug Flutie announced that he has been officially diagnosed with a severe case of Little Man Syndrome, or LMS.

Though not considered to be fatal, symptoms of LMS include bloating of the head, false perceptions of reality and upset stomachs.

Flutie, who finds pleasure in stealing candy from babies, syringes from drug addicts and time on NFL fields, is listed at an extremely generous 5-foot-10, with his small stature as an early indication that he may have the disease.

He is also a complete prick.

"We have always thought that Mr. Flutie has been suffering from Little Man Syndrome," Dr. Edward Flood of Boston Children's Hospital said. "Ever since the day he was born, he has shown signs of being arrogant, he has been rude to women and children and he likes to charge money for autographs. That last case typically happened during his playing days in Canada. He's also a very, very short man."

Dr. Flood pointed out that the NFL quarterback has had LMS for at least 20 years, though the disease was not detectable until recently.

"It was a clear indication that he had the illness when even his cup of piss showed signs of stubbornness, as the plastic container began to melt during the testing procedure. And I don't even want to get into the amounts of STD's that were crawling around afterward. They were identical to the diseases you can see popping out of the skirts of the cheerleaders on the BC sidelines."

According to his family, Flutie's condition has considerably worsened since being released by the San Diego Chargers on March 11.

He has ridiculed less fortunate people to a greater degree, such as the homeless, Canadians, trash-pickers and Ben Affleck. He would even try kicking former athletic director Reid Oslin in the nuts until he realized that pussy didn't have any.

And due to the recent unprecedented levels of the combination of sucking and choking by Boston College athletic teams, Flutie is even lashing out at his alma mater.

"First of all, let's get one thing straight," Flutie began. "[BC quar-

Freeman peaces out

By Nana Ampim & Drew Rossi
Collegian Reserves

Sources close to the Massachusetts men's basketball team revealed this morning that sophomore forward Rashaun "Ray-Ray" Freeman will forego his final two years of eligibility and enter the upcoming NBA Draft at the end of June.

Rumors began circulating about whether or not Freeman would leave UMass when, one day in a study hall session last week, he threw a little friggin' third-grader hissy fit about a recent grade he received on an exam in Jim Harrick, Jr.'s "Principles of Algebra and Basketball" class.

"Kevin Garnett ain't never done had to learn no (expletive) pytha-gonnorhea theorem," Ray-Ray was overheard shouting as he stormed through the hallways of Boyden Gymnasium. "I don't need no edumacation!"

After whining like a little baby, since-departed coach Steve Lappas helped Ray-Ray calm down by treating him to some juice boxes, the movie "Eddie" and a big shiny apple.

When asked where he got the apple from, Lappas replied, "Oh, ya know, my cousins, the Baboons down at the Southwick Zoo. Real nice people, ya know. I tell ya, real tough zoo to play basketball in, oh boy."

Ray-Ray celebrated his decision last night by stage-diving repeatedly at a local rock concert in downtown Northampton.

"He kept telling people, 'Look at me, I'm gonna be on SportsCenter biatch'," one local bystander said.

Ray-Ray is the first player since Lari Ketner to leave UMass early to enter the draft. Ketner left UMass after the 97-98 season and was drafted by the Golden State Warriors. Ketner lasted just three days on the team before they kicked his pretentious ass off the squad for being so bad, and the dude was last seen shooting free throws at the circus with Ron Artest.

With Ray-Ray at power forward the UMass Minutemen finished this season with a dismal 16-12 record, good enough for third in the A-10 East. The

Williams blazes a new trail to Amherst

Ricky Williams is not finished with football. In fact, according to his agent, Leigh Steinberg, Williams is just getting started.

In a press conference at the Cannabis Reform Coalition's (CRC) main offices, Williams announced his decision to sign with the Massachusetts football team and will take part in spring practices. Williams, a former Texas star, was awarded one year of eligibility despite prior constraints put forth by the NCAA. The press conference began with Williams strutting his new No. 420 UMass football jersey and ended with emotional words from the 27 year-old running back.

"When I retired from the Dolphins, I was at a really low point in my life," Williams said. "But now that I'm with the Minutemen, I know I can bring my life to that higher point. Much higher."

Williams then proceeded to laugh uncontrollably, which Leigh attributes to the joy associated with being in Amherst.

Since rushing for a total of 6,354 yards during his five-year NFL career, Williams has spent his time traveling to foreign countries and experimenting with different...cultures. His sudden retirement following the 2003 season was a result of several failed drug tests that Williams is adamant that will not be a problem.

"The issue of my past drug problems is not something I will be addressing today, or ever for that matter," Williams said. "Right now my main concern is weeding through the issues that I will be dealing with at UMass. Once I can weed through any problems I may encounter, the positives can stem from there."

One dilemma that Leigh is assisting Williams in is living conditions. Despite his situation, Williams wants to live on campus, rather than stay in an off-campus house well-within his budget.

"Ricky has told me he wants to live in the Central Residential Area, so that's most likely where he will live," Leigh said. "I understand that most athletes live in the Southwest Residential Area, but Ricky likes how Central is higher; he feels the walk up the hill everyday will get him in shape."

If all loose ends are resolved, Williams will join a

Battle for women in workplace not over yet, panel says

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The battles for women in public policy are not over yet, said the five-person, "Women in Public Policy" panel discussing the subject at a conference in Thompson Hall at the University of Massachusetts on Friday afternoon.

About 30 students and faculty gathered to see Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst), Dean Lisa Wyatt Ganson, Nothampton Mayor Mary Clare Higgins and Kristin Keel talk about their experiences as females working in the arena of public policy.

Dean Janet Rifkin of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences and Professor of Legal Studies at UMass was the panel moderator. "I am here to encourage these women to tell us about women in public policy through the lens of personal experience."

Story, the first panel member to speak of her experience in politics, is the State Representative for the 3rd Hampshire District and the first woman elected from her district.

Story said that she never expected to run for office.

"I realized I wasn't pleased with any of the people running, so I ran myself," she said. "I think ... that women hesitate to run for office because they think they have to know something before they run. Men are not hampered by that concept."

Story said she began to realize that men in the legislature meant well, but couldn't make laws for women because they didn't understand all the issues that a woman might worry about. For example, she says that when she tried to get a bill passed to clear up the fact that breast feeding in public is allowed in Massachusetts, the men she was working with "could not deal with it." The bill never passed.

Keel, the second panel speaker, is the Vice President for Financial Planning and Analysis

Pope John Paul II: 1920-2005

By Nicole Winfield

VATICAN CITY — Finally at rest after years of crippling disease, Pope John Paul II's body lay in state Sunday, his hands clutching a rosary, his pastoral staff under his arm. Millions prayed and wept at services across the globe, as the Vatican prepared for the ritual-filled funeral and conclave that will choose a successor.

Television images gave the public its first view of the pope since his death: lying in the Vatican's frescoed Apostolic Palace, dressed in crimson vestments and a white bishop's miter, his head resting on a stack of gold pillows. A Swiss Guard stood on either side as diplomats, politicians and clergy paid their respects at his feet.

An estimated 100,000 people turned out at St. Peter's Square for a morning Mass and thousands more — tourists, Romans, young and old — kept coming throughout the day, filling the broad boulevard leading to St. Peter's Basilica. They clutched rosaries and newspaper photos of the late pontiff as they stood shoulder-to-shoulder to pray for the soul of "our beloved John Paul."

"Even if we fear we've lost a point of reference, I feel like everybody in this square is united with him in a hug," said Luca Ghizzardi, a 38-year-old nurse with a sleeping bag and a hand-made peace flag at his feet.

Early Sunday, a text message had circulated on cell phones in Rome, asking people to light candles in their windows. "May they light up the road to God for him, the way he did for us," the message said.

Around the world, bells tolled and worshippers prayed in remembrance of the man who reigned for longer than all but two of his predecessors and was credited with helping bring down communism in Europe and spreading a message of peace during his frequent travels around the world.

John Paul, who was 58 when the cardinals elected him the first non-Italian pope in 455 years, also left a legacy of conservatism. He opposed divorce, birth control and abortion, the ordination of women and the lifting of the celibacy requirement for priests.

The mourning stretched from the pope's native Poland, where 100,000 people filled a Warsaw square at the spot where he celebrated a landmark Mass 26 years ago, to the earthquake-devastated Indonesian island of Nias, where a priest led special prayers. In Paris, the great bell of Notre Dame sounded 84 times — once for each year of the pontiff's life — as a crowd of 25,000 massed outside.

In New York, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and former Mayor Rudolph Giuliani joined parishioners who packed St. Patrick's Cathedral for a standing-room-only Mass.

"He showed us how to live and he showed us how to die," said one parishioner, Joan McDermott. "He reached out to people of all faiths, not just Catholics and Christians."

In the Holy Land, Israelis remembered John Paul as a builder of bridges between the faiths, noting how he had embraced Holocaust survivors with kindness and maintained friendships with Jewish friends from childhood.

In Rome, officials were scrambling for a huge influx of pilgrims — up to 2 million of them — seeking to pay final respects to the late pontiff. Starting Monday, the pope's body was to lie in state at St. Peter's Basilica.

The College of Cardinals — the red-capped "princes of the church" who now officially govern the 1 billion-strong Roman Catholic Church — was to hold its first meeting Monday, a pre-conclave gathering expected to plan and set a date for the funeral later this week at St. Peter's Square.

President Bush was expected to attend the funeral, which will draw other world leaders as well as Vatican hierarchy and ordinary faithful. The conclave must begin 15 to 20 days after the pope's death.

Bay State mourns Pope John Paul II

STOCKBRIDGE — They came by the thousands — bused after busload of Roman Catholic pilgrims, mourning the pope's death while celebrating Mercy Sunday at a Berkshire hillside shrine.

It was a day of special significance to those who huddled under umbrellas against a cold rain and slogged through puddles of mud to hear Springfield Bishop Timothy McDonnell celebrate the annual outdoor Mass.

The feast day was instituted by Pope John Paul II five years ago, on the same day he canonized Saint Faustina, a fellow Pole who preached God's ability to forgive even the most egregious sinner.

"The pope died on the eve of this very special day," said Lilian Oguh, who traveled to Stockbridge on Sunday with members of her prayer group from Springfield, N.J. "And that reinforces the message of divine mercy. He showed us how to love and forgive here on Earth. Now he's gone to a better place."

For many of the estimated 15,000 pilgrims who flocked to Stockbridge, this year's Mercy Sunday was both a time to lament the loss of a spiritual leader and an opportunity to reflect on his impact on their lives and look to the future.

"I hope God sends us another pope who was just like him," said Juanita Lopez, 69, from Brooklyn, N.Y. "I hope we have another pope who can bring the world together."

Attendance has been higher in the years since the Congregation of Marians opened the shrine in 1960 and dedicated it to Sister Faustina Kowalska, a Polish nun who had visions of Jesus.

But the shrine's connection to the pope were recalled by many on Sunday. Sister Faustina died in Poland in 1938, and John Paul II made her canonization one of his top priorities after becoming pope in 1978. He made her a saint on April 30, 2000 the first Sunday after Easter.

"It's a blessing to have John Paul II taken to heaven on the even of Mercy Sunday," said Dorothy Bolduc, of Rensselaer, N.Y. "I couldn't imagine a more beautiful time for him to go."

At the feet of a statue of the pope who died Saturday, Bolduc placed yellow and white roses to honor the colors of the papal flag.

"Our hearts are broken because we won't see any more of the blessings he gave when he waved his hands," said Bolduc, who was wearing a hat emblazoned with a picture of the smiling, waving pontiff. "But there's so much joy in what he left us, which is how we can all live together. He was a pope for all people."

Indeed, the grounds of the shrine were something of a testament to John Paul II's ability to extend the reach of the Catholic Church around the globe. Chinese, Haitian, Filipino and Hispanic groups chartered buses to the event.

"Divine mercy means absolute love," said Guadalupe Pierson, a 60-year-old Nicaraguan who now lives in Bethesda, Md. "That's what this pope stood for. He wanted to unite the world."

During his homily, Bishop McDonnell recalled the pope as a man who was able to overcome the oppression and tyranny of the Nazis in his native Poland and dedicated his life to delivering a message of worldwide peace.

Congressman Olver, Barnes and Noble donate library books to local school

HADLEY — Congressman John Olver (D-MA) said Friday that funding of public libraries with property taxes means educational malnutrition for poor school districts.

"It's just like splitting the pie. The wealthier the community is, the bigger the library they get. The poor communities just don't have the money," Olver said. "They try to set up a distributional mechanism, but they never completely work."

As part of the "One Million Books for the One Million Children" book drive, the Congressman joined the staff of the Barnes and Noble bookstore in Hadley to celebrate the donation of 1,500 books collected since last Thanksgiving in cooperation with the Reader to Reader Charity. This organization is dedicated to bringing books free of charge to needy libraries around the United States. They supply books for all reading levels from elementary and secondary to colleges and universities.

Olver was joined by students and staff from the Memorial Elementary School in West Springfield. The students spent a $300 grant from Barnes and Noble Courtesy of Reader to Reader.

A nine-year-old third grader named Ivan whose birthday was Thursday said it was his first time in the Barnes and Noble. He said the book-buying trip was a birthday gift.

"I like going to bookstores," he said. "Books that you read a half hour, and you didn't finish them, you can take them home."

UMass-Boston names chancellor finalists

BOSTON — A search committee named three finalists Friday for the chancellorship of the University of Massachusetts-Boston.

Among them was J. Keith Motley, who has been serving as interim chancellor since Jo Ann Gora, who left in August to become president of Ball State University.

The other finalists are Dr. Michael F. Collins, a clinical professor of internal medicine at Tufts University School of Medicine; and Marvin Krislov, a vice president and general counsel at the University of Michigan.

UMass President Jack Wilson is expected to make a recommendation on the final selection to the university's board of trustees before its next meeting in May.

Motley was UMass-Boston's vice chancellor of student affairs for almost one year before taking the interim position, and before that held several posts at Northeastern University.

Collins was president and chief executive of Caritas Christi Health Care System from 1994 to 2004.

Krislov, who is also an adjunct professor at Michigan's law school and political science department, played a lead role in the university's affirmative action lawsuits.

US attorney eyed by GOP for Attorney General job

By Denise Lavoie

U.S. attorney Michael J. Sullivan

BOSTON — Michael J. Sullivan loved being a district attorney in Brockton. He could look out his office window and see the fruits of prosecuting drug dealers: people walking without fear on the streets of the old mill town, children frolicking on playgrounds.

When Sullivan was nominated as U.S. attorney for Massachusetts, he worried he wouldn't find the job as satisfying. He needn't have worried.

Sullivan took office a week after two planes hijacked from Boston were used in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Since then, he's had a nonstop run of cases that raised the ire of some defense attorneys but made him the talk of political circles.

His tough-on-crime reputation, combined with his clean-cut image and political connections, have some Republicans talking him up as a 2006 candidate for state attorney general. The incumbent, Democrat Tom Reilly, is eyeing a run for governor.

Though Sullivan says he's been too busy in his current job to think about running for another office, those who know him say he's an obvious choice.

"If he hasn't thought about it, he should," said Jim Nuzzo, a GOP political analyst.

"He has done a really good job as U.S. attorney, and it's one of those of those jumping off points

Lt. Governor Healy defends remarks about the elderly

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — It wasn't Kerry Healey's best day.

The typically articulate Republican lieutenant governor was talking up Gov. Mitt Romney's "smart growth" initiative — designed to combat suburban sprawl, in part by encouraging new housing in town centers.

Somewhere between her brain and mouth, the message got garbled. Instead of touting smart growth, Healey suggested to a reporter for the State House News Service that "overhoused and isolated" seniors would be better off moving into "more appropriate housing" in city and town centers.

The gaffe caused a minuproar, with seniors decrying the statement and Healey protesting that her comments were taken out of context.

It also prompted comparisons between Healey and her predecessor, fellow Republican Jane Swift, who saw her credibility eroded by a series of PR gaffes during her tenure as lieutenant and acting governor.

As Romney flirts with a possible run for president in 2008, Healey's public profile is on the rise midway through her four-year term, and not all the attention has been good.

The governor's office scrambled to control the damage from Healey's comments, hustling her before the television cameras and, a week later, unveiling a senior tax relief package that would help seniors stay in their homes.

In February, she acknowledged it was wrong to allow a state trooper to whisk her through traffic with blue lights flashing when there was no emergency.

That episode conjured images of Swift's now-infamous 1999 helicopter ride, in which she used a state police chopper to fly home to western Massachusetts when she was lieutenant governor.

But Healey's defenders say comparisons to Swift are strained at best and sexist at worst.

"The press has continued to

try to draw those parallels, but I would think that were we discussing men who had occupied similar positions over time probably that discussion would not be happening," Healey said in an interview with The Associated Press.

But she acknowledged that the lieutenant governor's role as a supporting actor can be as much a curse as a blessing. Most of the positive things she does are invisible to the public, while every perceived blunder grabs headlines.

Schiavo case to be used in legal battles

By Robert Tanner
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The arguments surrounding Terri Schiavo will live on in statehouse debate and new laws if an emerging coalition of disability rights activists and right-to-lifers succeed in turning the national agony over her case into a re-examination of when and how our lives come to an end.

So far, only a few legislators in a handful of states have sought significant changes to their laws, which delve the fundamental elements at stake — how a person can set limits on their medical care, who gets to decide what their wishes are, what evidence is needed to prove it.

None have yet become law and the chances for most, if not all, are slim this year, with some legislatures finished and many far along in their work for this session. But both Republicans and Democrats say the arguments aren't going away.

ment of septic shock and cardiocirculatory collapse, the Vatican said.

The mourning began with an overnight vigil in St. Peter's Square. In keeping with Vatican tradition, Cardinal Camillo Ruini, the late pope's vicar for Rome, issued a formal announcement of John Paul's death to the people of Rome early Sunday.

Cardinal Angelo Sodano, the Vatican's No. 2 official, gave the homily at Sunday's Mass at St. Peter's. "For a quarter century, he brought the Gospel of Christian hope to all the piazzas of the world, teaching all of us that our death is nothing but the passage toward the homeland in the sky," he said.

The written text of Sodano's homily called the late pope "John Paul the Great," a title usually designated for popes worthy of sainthood, such as Gregory the Great and Leo the Great. Sodano did not use the title when he delivered the homily, and there was no explanation. Vatican texts, however, are considered official texts even if they are not pronounced.

After the Mass ended, Archbishop Leonardo Sandri, who became the pope's public "voice" in the final weeks of his life, read the traditional Sunday noontime prayer, which John Paul delivered throughout his pontificate.

The crowd applauded, and some fought back tears, when Sandri announced that the late pope prepared the prayer himself before he died — perhaps one of John Paul's last written documents.

"It's a historic event," said Ercole Ferri, a 72-year-old Roman who proudly showed off a list of the six popes he has lived through. "It's not something sad for me. I think of all that he has done."

"I think more about how hard it will be for a new one to follow in his footsteps," he added.

"John Paul held his hand to us young people," said 21-year-old Alessio Bussolotti, who drove to Rome with his fellow Boy Scouts from the Italian city of Ancona. "Now we have to give him ours."

Once the Mass ended, cardinals, prelates, Italian government officials and diplomats gathered in the Sala Clementina of the Apostolic Palace, where John Paul's body lay in state.

His crossed hands clutched a rosary, and his pastoral staff was tucked under his left arm.

"Our Holy Father looks very much at peace. It was very satisfying for all of us to see him so serene," Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles said after paying his respects. "His life is finished and he gave up his spirit."

At their meetings beginning Monday, the cardinals will read John Paul's final instructions, including his choice of burial place. Most popes in recent centuries have asked to be buried in the crypts below St. Peter's Basilica, but some have suggested the first Polish-born pope might have chosen to be laid to rest in his native country.

In addition, the cardinals will arrange for the destruction of John Paul's Fisherman's Ring and the dies used to make lead seals for apostolic letters — formal gestures meant to symbolize the end of his reign and to prevent forgeries.

On the sidelines, cardinals will certainly be sizing each other up as possible "papabili," or having the qualities to be the next pope.

Cardinal Bernard Panafieu, one of five French prelates who can vote, said Sunday he was hoping for someone "who dynamizes the people — God's people — as John Paul II did. At the same time, a man who has an international sense, of the opening of Catholicism to the world. An open man and at the same time, a man faithful to the great traditions of the Church."

John Paul survived a 1981 assassination attempt, but in his later years was the picture of frailty, weighed down by Parkinson's disease and crippling knee and hip ailments. Although he continued his travels, he was too weak to continue his famous gesture of kissing the ground when he arrived at his destinations.

Hospitalized twice in the past two months after breathing crises, and fitted with a breathing tube and a feeding tube, John Paul became a picture of suffering as his death approached.

GOP members want Sullivan to run for Attorney General

for people, particularly for us on the Republican side who don't have an awful lot of offices at our disposal in Massachusetts," Nuzzo said.

Sullivan was first elected to public office in 1990, winning his first of three terms as a state representative from Abington. In 1995, Gov. William Weld appointed him Plymouth County district attorney after William O'Malley died in office.

Six years later, former Gov. Paul Cellucci and White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card — a longtime friend — urged President Bush to appoint Sullivan as U.S. attorney.

Cellucci said he was impressed by Sullivan's work as district attorney.

"He did a lot of work on child abuse and domestic violence," said Cellucci, who went on to become Bush's first-term ambassador to Canada. "Mike Sullivan's leadership in Plymouth County made sure that these cases were handled as priorities and as serious violations of the law."

But some of Sullivan's decisions have prompted sharp criticism from defense lawyers who complain that he refuses to plea bargain and always seeks the maximum sentence — no matter how small the crime.

U.S. District Judge Mark Wolf took the unusual step of criticizing Sullivan publicly for bringing a high volume of gun and drug cases that could be handled by state prosecutors.

Sullivan has also been criticized for seeking the federal death penalty in Massachusetts, where there is no state death penalty statute.

But it's this hard-line, tough-on-crime image that makes Sullivan attractive to Republican leaders, qualities they believe will resonate with voters.

"He's had an opportunity to run a major law enforcement agency here in Massachusetts and his mettle has been tested," Nuzzo said. "Frankly, I think Mike has acquitted himself very well on the job."

Sullivan's critics say he's rigid and uncompromising, and hasn't shown an ability to temper punishment with compassion.

"They appear to be pushing cases to trial that they shouldn't be," said Boston attorney Norman Zalkind, who represented Brima Wurie, a Boston gang member charged in the killing of a rival. Sullivan had initially considered a death penalty prosecution for Wurie, but later opted against it.

Panel speaks workplace gender issues at Harvard Pilgrim Health Care. Keel worked more in the public policy area when she worked as the Undersecretary for the Executive Office of Administration and Finance for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Keel related stories about having to deal with men in the workplace. "I feel I have to be very assertive when I first meet men, that any trace of feminine friendliness could set me back."

Keel told of times when she had to deal with a local sheriff who tried to kiss women instead of going for a handshake, and of a time when she found that wearing a shorter skirt helped smooth negotiations with an all-male group.

"I'm almost embarrassed about that now. It's not that I even made a conscious decision to do that, I just realized one day that negotiations were more productive on days when I wore a short skirt."

Higgins, another panel member, has been the Mayor of Northampton for five years, a former city councilor and has experience as a teen-parent childcare worker.

Higgins had been working to help teen parents for years, which she says was her doorway into politics. When she got involved in working for teen housing in Northampton, she was inspired to run for city council because she was unhappy with the current councilors

Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst), Kristin Keel, Janet Rifkin and Northampton Mayor Mary Clare Higgins speak about gender issues in the workplace in Thompson Hall at UMass on Friday.

"I didn't run because it was what I had dreamed of, I ran because I was pissed off," Higgins said.

Higgins said that some gender issues were moot for her.

"I'm a lesbian and I'm out about it, so there's really no hope for these guys," Higgins also said that she used humor to diffuse tense situations when dealing with men and that she makes a point to make rounds of the city to show that she is accessible.

Ganson, the final speaker, is the Dean of Science of Engineering and Mathematics at Holyoke Community College. She was also a Director of Vocational/Educational Services for the New York City Department of Corrections and Samaritan Village.

As a young, black woman working in a world mostly run by old, white males, Ganson said that "this was my challenge." Ganson has worked hard toward making education accessible to those in correctional facilities.

"I would see these people and see the skills they had and wonder why they were left behind," she said.

Perhaps the biggest issue that Ganson felt she faced about gender alone was that she expected more from women than she did from men. "Maybe that happens because I'm still looking for role models in these women," she said.

The other panelists all called for the women in the audience to get involved in the realm of public policy saying that women are still the minority and women's issues will continue to be decided by men until women put themselves up as "public servants in positions of power."

Iraqi lawmakers reach out to bring in new leadership

By Tracy Carl
Associated Press

Hajim al-Hassani, a Sunni Muslim, votes Sunday. He was elected speaker of the new Iraqi Parliament.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Lawmakers broke days of rancorous stalemate Sunday and reached out to Iraq's Sunni Muslim minority for their parliament speaker, cutting through ethnic and sectarian barriers that have held up selection of a new government for more than two months since the country's first free elections in 50 years.

Deputies still face, however, difficult choices for Cabinet posts and failed again to name a new president — broadly expected to be Kurdish leader Jalal Talabani. That choice and those of two vice presidents were put off until a Wednesday session that could mark a major milestone as Iraq tries to build a democratic government and civil society.

Once the president and his deputies are selected, they have 14 days to choose a prime minister, the most powerful position in Iraq's envisioned government hierarchy. That job was widely believed reserved for Ibrahim al-Jaafari, of the Shiite Muslim majority.

Pressure is building on parliamentarians, with some growing frustrated with the slow pace of forming a government, because they have an Aug. 15 deadline to write a permanent constitution — a task that cannot be undertaken until a government is in place.

Sunday's selection as speaker — Industry Minister Hajim al-Hassani, one of only 17 Sunni Arabs in parliament — could signal progress in the political tussle over selecting politicians for key Cabinet posts, a process that has been snarled by disagreement over how to reach out to the Sunnis.

They are believed to make up the backbone of the Iraqi insurgency, were dominant under ousted dictator Saddam Hussein and largely boycotted the Jan. 30 elections or stayed home for fear of being attacked at the polls.

The choice of al-Hassani, however, was not well received in all quarters.

Osama Abdullatah, a 30-year-old architect and a Sunni, said the new speaker's support last year of the U.S. assault on the militant stronghold of Fallujah showed he "does not have beliefs, and will never do anything against his benefit."

Al-Hassani refused to quit as industry ministry even though his Iraqi Islamic Party pulled out of the interim government over the issue.

"How could we just trust such a traitor?" Abdullatah asked.

Former nuclear scientist Hussain al-Shahristani, a Shiite, and Kurdish official Aref Taifour were chosen deputy speakers.

The speaker's job, not the most sought-after positions in the still-forming Iraqi hierarchy, produced more than a week of sometimes angry haggling. A Tuesday session ended in shouting and finger-pointing with reporters hustled out of the chamber to keep them from witnessing more of the angry exchanges as deputies tried to agree on candidates.

"It's time for the patient Iraqi people to be treated with the dignity that God has given them," al-Hassani said Sunday, accepting his new post.

"If we neglect our duties and fail, then we will hurt ourselves and the people will replace us with others," al-Hassani said, urging cooperation among lawmakers.

Voting was by paper ballot, with each legislator allowed to select as many as three names to fill the posts of speaker and two deputies. The top three were Al-Hassani with 215 votes, al-Shahristani won 157 and Taifour captured 96.

Lawmakers appeared largely happy with the choice of the three men, but some expressed disappointment that a president was not chosen as planned.

The debate is an effort to strike a new balance between one stance that argues that medical care and morality mean life must be pursued in nearly all cases, and another stance crafted over decades of changing views about death that some may choose to end drastically damaged lives that depend on artificial means.

"I really wanted to make sure we give a default for life and not for death," said Kansas state Rep. Mary Pilcher Cook, a Republican who helped revive a measure that would give courts a greater chance to review decisions to end life-sustaining care, lessening the role of guardians or doctors. "Our most vulnerable citizens are in fact in the most danger of losing their life without any recourse."

She was joined in her effort by disability activists, many aligned with liberal causes, and Democrats in the state House. The measure stalled in the Kansas Senate, however, as the session ended for the year last Friday.

"We don't want to get into the politics of the right or the left or whomever," said Michael Donnelly at the Disability Rights Center of Kansas. "This isn't about politics, this is about how we value or don't value the lives people with disabilities have."

His group had been working for years to revisit the issue, and came together with several conservative legislators to move the bill forward. Elsewhere, the National Right to Life Committee has produced model legislation and is working with legislators in several states.

Fantasy baseball and reality

Chris Eckel

So there I was, hunched over my computer making my picks. The annual fantasy baseball draft wars had begun, and I had fired the first warning shot by drafting aggressively. This game seems to be the next best thing to actually being Theo Epstein, so it will have to do for now. I'm pleased with my team, but any and all trades will be considered.

As I was drafting, I caught another CNN report about all the people keeping vigil outside of the building where Terri Schiavo was slowly dying. I thought to myself, either Terri has the largest extended family I'd ever seen, or many of these people weren't actually related or even acquaintances of the poor woman. Once the obligatory interviews montage occurred, it became obvious that none of them was, in fact, even remotely personally familiar with Terri. They were all either curious bystanders, protestors or desperate to appear on television.

I remember the same phenomenon at the Scott Peterson trial. There were thousands of people milling about the outside of the courthouse, seemingly at all hours of the day, just waiting for something to happen. Whenever the prosecution made big progress, a frat party atmosphere broke out. Whenever it seemed like Peterson might be leaving court a free man, the scene turned to a somber vigil. Whenever people were interviewed, it often seemed as though they condemned Scott Peterson and grieved as if they themselves had lost a family member. This seems wholly inappropriate to me.

This vicarious lifestyle demonstrated by all the spectators is enormously disturbing. Big court cases often seem to attract hordes of people who have become "emotionally invested" with some figure in the case. Don't these people have jobs, friends and family of their own? Why must they pour so much of themselves into someone they have never met? When they go home at the end of a long day of praying or protesting for someone they are "passionate" about, do they have anything left to give to those people who actually know and care for them?

This seems like a waste of a day, to get involved in something that doesn't really involve you. Instead, why aren't these people picnicking in the park or taking in a baseball game? I do understand that some may justify their involvement by arguing that they wish to take a stand on a particular issue. In that case, why aren't these crusaders taking part in vigils for thousands of other people who are on life support, and why aren't they standing outside the thousands of courts where lesser-known people are being tried for crimes as serious as those for which Scott Peterson was convicted?

This vicarious lifestyle demonstrated by all the spectators is enormously disturbing. Big court cases often seem to attract hordes of people who have become "emotionally invested" with some figure in the case.

The answer seems simple. Americans would rather take part in something that the media chooses to glorify than to just be happy living their own lives. Being on the six o'clock news seems to validate for many that they were part of something exciting. This perverted vicarious living is hardly limited to those who stand outside of courthouses and hospitals hoping to blab on about their point of view.

Reality T.V., where people watch other people doing what they wish they could do, is all the rage. Fantasy baseball, which I, in the fine tradition of journalistic disclosure, have mentioned I participate in, is one of the fastest growing leisure industries in the country. (I excuse myself by reasoning that it takes one-half hour per week, not weeks at a time.) Don't even get me started on the parents who seem to take more pride in their child's athletic, academic or other accomplishments than does the child him/herself. If I hear one more story about parents cheating for their kids, or yelling at a ref, I think I'll gag.

Why do we all insist on continually trying out other people's lives by inserting ourselves without much in the way of permission? We need to stop focusing on and ingratiating ourselves into other people's lives. Your life may not be broadcast on CNN every day, but that doesn't mean it's not without value and not exciting. In fact, I'm fairly sure that your friends are doing something exciting right about ... now.

So put down this newspaper (as soon as you read my snappy conclusion, that is), and go out and live your own life, avoiding what are properly the concerns of others. Play some Frisbee or tan on Southwest Beach and count the blessings of each and every peaceful day you aren't on network news. I'm willing to bet Terri would much rather be anonymous right now, don't you?

Enjoy the spring weather, UMass; I'll see you out there as soon as I finish negotiating this blockbuster trade.

Time to mature as students

Bret Devereaux

If you spend any time reading the Collegian's op/ed section, by now you have seen similar campus issues repeated many times. Most of these issues on campus boil down to a few essential issues. Students want their concerns to be treated as significant and real by the administration.

Students want their elected body, the SGA, to be significant and real in and of itself. Students object to the rising cost of attending the University and to what they see as an administration (whose salaries they pay, let's not forget that the school is funded by tax dollars and our money ... and tax dollars really are just our money, as well) that is ignoring them.

In short, the student body wants just one thing: To be treated like adults.

It makes sense. The students at this university, from the lowly undeclared freshmen to the specialized graduate student, are legal adults. We can vote and we can be drafted. We have to pay taxes. We are, for all legal purposes, with the exception of the consumption of alcohol, adults. It seems only fair that we should expect to be treated as such.

However, I would propose that if the student body wishes to be treated like adults as opposed to foolish children, then perhaps it should begin to act the part. Acting the part is a key step in defining your role. For example, if you act confident, other people will respond to your confidence, and you will eventually become confident as a result of what was originally just an act. How much more potent would the effort to act like adults be, seeing as how we are actually adults?

But, the student body as a whole doesn't act as such. Look down for a moment as you walk to class, and note the cigarette detritus and other garbage. Walk outside of the dorms (or at the very least, Baker) and note the broken bits of glass bottles that litter the area below the windows. Stand outside on a Friday, and listen to people just making meaningless noise. Now, I have nothing against having a good time, especially on a Friday, but there's a difference between having a good time and howling like a banshee at 3 a.m.

... if the student body wishes to be treated like adults as opposed to foolish children, then perhaps it should begin to act the part.

Common courtesy is part of being an adult. Making some attempt not to disturb your neighbors, trying to keep the campus at least in some semblance of cleanliness, not dumping your garbage on others: that's part of being an adult.

For those of my readers who are thinking, "Wait, most UMass students do act their age!" I defy you to prove it in the face of a Red Sox World Series win, a Patriots super-bowl run or the fact that we refer to our own University as 'Zoomass.'

Students wonder why the costs of going to school are going up. Perhaps part of the reason might be that the Red Sox beating the Yankees cost the University several hundred thousand dollars. Perhaps the fact that the University is forced to clean up after students is a part of the problem.

If we want our demands to be treated like the demands of mature adults, we should start acting like mature adults, not churlish savages or epicurean children. The student body wants to be taken seriously instead of herded like cattle.

The first part of being taken serious is taking yourself and what you are doing here seriously. This may come as a shock to you, but taking college seriously may mean not indulging in the puerile antics that so often plague this campus.

Perhaps, if we want to be treated like adults, we should act like adults.

Bret Devereaux is a UMass student.

Abstinence preached to a fault

Allison Edles

The Bush administration has, once again, sparked another heated debate that is proving to segregate the country more so than bringing it together. A new Web site launched by the government, 4parents.gov, is currently under fire by advocacy groups who feel that the Web site offers "biased and inaccurate advice to parents on how to talk to their children about sex," according to a CNN.com article. The debate is circled around the fact that abstinence is more heavily enforced on the Web site than safe sex and effective uses of contraception. While the intentions behind the Web site are certainly noble, the advice offered is completely ineffective and useless.

For example, on a section on the site that is labeled "Talk about Condoms" under "Talk Topics," the benefits of proper condom use aren't mentioned until the last paragraph on the page. The majority of the page is spent talking about the down sides of condom use. No where does it mention how to properly use a condom or speak of the benefits that come with its use. Clearly, the biased opinion of the administration is shining through, while offering incorrect information.

Whether it is widely accepted or not, young people are going to have sex. There is very little anyone, government or parents, can do to prevent it. The best bet that any of these people have is to hope and encourage them to do so safely.

Now, I'm not going to come right out and say that the Bush administration is lying to the parents of Americans that this Web site was projected to, but there is something to be said about lying by omission. If people truly want their children to not have sex, falsifying and demeaning methods of contraception is not the appropriate way to handle the situation.

In a society that has liberal tendencies, there are many conservative ideals that people still try to adhere to. For example, while premarital sex is very common among the American population, the ideal that a couple would wait until they are married to have sex is still glorified. While it is not a pragmatic reality, the thought is there and at one point or another, has entered everyone's mind at least once throughout their lives.

There are still many traditions that cannot be broken, simply because of the rarity of those occurrences, not the importance.

Teens as much as people would like to ignore, are not mindless hormone-filled genitalia running around looking to hump anything that's deep enough and long enough. They have sense and know, if not are learning, how to use it.

Marriage is sacred, but has sort of strayed from many of the sacred ideals because of the frequency at which it occurs. On the other hand, with the death of Pope John Paul II, all the traditions and rituals surrounding the demise and reinstating of a new Pope are going to be followed strictly, regardless how realistic and practical they may be viewed through modern eyes.

The site, in effect, does not advise parents on how to handle their teenager and aid them in making the proper decisions regarding sex. However, it does instill a guilt complex among the teens. And while the facts supporting the guilt are all based in science, the reasoning behind the guilt continues to be based in religion.

Regardless of what religious faith a person is following, guilt is there and is the reason behind many of the ideals still being enforced today. For Jews, guilt has become a method of enabling parents to get what they want out of their children. For Christians, it has become something to make sure sin is avoided and the good life lived. Either way, guilt has no place in modern-day politics. The American teenage population is not a combined "bad seed," nor is it the proverbial slut of the greater international area.

Sensible and honest talk with a teenager, along with some graphic pictures of genital herpes, is a perfect way to give them just enough information to be dangerous. Or, better ways to inform teenagers are through examples; told to them, of course, not of them. Teens, as much as people would like to ignore, are not mindless hormone-filled genitalia running around looking to hump anything that's deep enough and long enough. They have sense and know, or if not, are learning, how to use it.

The Web site should not be taken down as many protesters have recommended, but instead should be modified. If teenage sex is really such a discouraging and terrifying danger to this country, then maybe methods of contraception such as birth control pills and condoms should be placed on the government's list of biological warfare and weapons of mass destruction.

It is important to inform teenagers of mistakes they can make. However, parents need to be given a little more credit in how they raise their teenagers.

The Bush administration, as well as any idiot with money and a domain name, can preach as much as they want about abstinence and advise against it whole-heartedly if they so choose. But to ignore and distort the facts surrounding safe sex speaks very poorly of the intelligence and intentions of our nation's government.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

ELIMINATION OF LEFTIST TERRORISTS

I would like to thank Ben Duffy for his insightful analysis and courageous political activism at UMass Amherst, especially in the face of such an oppressive and close-minded environment that has been dominated by the populous and aggressive ultra-left presence on campus.

Duffy's efforts to out the left and its connections to international terrorism — especially of the Arab extremist variety — were particularly enlightening. I have always believed that those who criticize America are consequently anti-American, but I never realized until now that those who do not support America's current war were actually going so far as to support terrorism itself.

As an American nationalist, I immediately ran to the history books and submerged myself in alternative media such as FOX News and CNN so that I might cut through the propaganda and discover other America-haters and terrorist-sympathizers that are threatening our nation. I quickly came up with the names of others who could be added to Duffy's/Dershowitz's list of terrorist sympathizers: Pope John Paul II, Nelson Mandela, Seymour Hersh, Ronald Reagan and the CIA.

Pope John Paul II, in his commitment to such things as human dignity, respect for life and the Ten Commandments, had come out against the current American war against Iraq and the resulting occupation of that nation, simply because a mere hundred thousand Iraqis and 1,500 plus American troops had to die. Freedom isn't free you know, even if you are God's representative on earth. Despite his death, the Pope must be held accountable for his terrorist sympathies and denial of God's true representative on Earth, namely George W. Bush and his Army of Christian Soldiers.

Nelson Mandela, accurately described as a terrorist many years ago by Vice President Dick Cheney for his resistance to Apartheid in Africa (another barbarous nation full of potential terrorists), has reaffirmed his terrorist identity by coming out against the liberation of the Iraqi people by the U.S. military simply because it broke international law and resulted in mass death, starvation, disease and regional instability. What arrogance and shortsightedness.

Seymour Hersh, notorious lefty reporter who broke the story on Abu Ghraib is naturally a terrorist propagandist. Anyone who tries to destroy the moraie of our troops by pointing out that the U.S. sometimes has to play rough to keep us free is simply writing for the benefit of the enemy and attacking the American spirit.

The Abu Ghraib scandal is not a scandal at all, but a triumph of western ideals. Lets see if those terrorists won't change their minds about women's rights after having been sodomized by them and having been smeared with the American Ambrosia of femme-soldier menstrual blood.

Finally, I must reveal the hidden history of Ronald Reagan as a closet leftist and the CIA as a kind of shadow government created and maintained by leftists. Following the logic that all leftists are terrorist sympathizers and that all terrorists are supported by the networks of an international leftist coalition, we must accept that both Reagan and the CIA are leftist pawns.

In their political, military and financial support of Osama bin Laden and Afghanistan's mujahideen in the 70's and early 80's, both Reagan and the CIA are clearly terrorists themselves. By training bin Laden and funding his efforts against the U.S.'s Cold War enemy, the U.S.S.R., Reagan and the CIA basically paid for the passenger fare of those who would crash American airline planes into the WTC in 2001.

Only by smoking out the terrorist sympathizers and murdering the terrorists themselves may this nation both continue its mission of spreading freedom while maintaining itself as a beacon of freedom of thought and political expression for the rest of the world.

"Prayer, which in so many ways expresses our relationship to the living God, is the pope's first duty and his first message, the first condition of his service to the church and the world."

— John Paul, in the early days of his papacy.

"During the last months, God permitted me to experience suffering and the danger of losing my life. He also allowed me to understand clearly ... that this was one of His special graces for me as a man and at the same time ... for the church."

— Pope John Paul II, addressing a crowd of pilgrims in St. Peter's Square after recuperating from the 1981 shooting.

Pope John Paul II brought Catholicism to the masses

By David Crumm and Patricia Montemurri
Knight Ridder

For more than a quarter century, Karol Wojtyla was the world's spiritual superpower. As Pope John Paul II, his decisions shaped the lives of more than 1 billion Catholics around the world — by far, the largest organized religious group on Earth.

He used his personal charisma in a tireless campaign for a Catholic vision of human rights that helped to topple communism, defend the poor and build bridges to other faiths, especially Judaism.

His followers did not always agree with him, but their affection and respect were obvious in more than 100 tours, when vast crowds around the world were drawn to his outdoor Masses.

"He brought the human face of the Vatican to people of every culture in every part of the world," said Detroit Cardinal Adam Maida. "He showed that the pope is not someone who is locked up in the Vatican, but is truly a man whose mission is bringing the gospel message to the people of the world."

In more than 25 years of travels and Vatican public events, John Paul spoke in person to more people than any other human in history.

"This is the greatest Christian witness of our time," said papal biographer George Weigel.

Historians ranked John Paul as either the third or fourth longest-serving pope, depending on how many years they credited to St. Peter 2,000 years ago. John Paul's impact on the church will be felt for many years to come. He appointed nearly all of the church's top leaders, modernized and clarified the entire code of church laws and supervised a complete revision of the catechism, the official summary of Catholic doctrine.

Though raised in an era of horse-drawn carts, he ended his life recording messages on CD-ROM, hosting a vast Web site, www.vatican.va, and joining passionately in scientific debates on genetic engineering and cloning.

Elected at the relatively young age of 58, he was admired for his courage and vigor. It seemed that nothing could stop him. In his youth, he survived the Nazi invasion of his native Poland and, as a young priest and bishop, survived the communist oppression that settled over his homeland.

Against the odds, in 1978, he became the first non-Italian pontiff since 1523.

When Mehmet Ali Agca shot him in St. Peter's Square on May 13, 1981, he survived and then turned the near-fatal incident into a moral lesson by visiting his attacker in prison and forgiving him.

As he aged, he was admired for his iron-willed stamina. He kept traveling and celebrating masses despite an abdominal tumor, removed by surgeons in 1992, followed by falls that dislocated an arm and broke a leg. Even when Parkinson's disease made speaking difficult and walking nearly impossible, he persevered.

Over the decades, John Paul devoted much of his energy to challenging the world's political power brokers with his vision of morality and social justice. Presidents and premiers often tried to ignore or take advantage of him, but he was resolutely clear about his vision of human rights even when that vision collided with secular regimes.

In the spring of 2003 in the United States, the combined influence of 36 Protestant and Orthodox denominations at the National Council of Churches couldn't get access to President George W. Bush to deliver an antiwar warning. But, when the pope wanted to weigh in, Bush welcomed Cardinal Pio Laghi at the White House, though Bush knew he was providing a stage for the Vatican's message.

"The president could not turn away the pope's emissary," said Robert Edgar, head of the council in New York. "The pope understood that in this day and age, war is obsolete, and he took a leadership role in speaking out."

The pope could not prevent a war in Iraq, but he is widely credited with playing a catalytic role in toppling the communist regimes in Eastern Europe.

John Paul argued that the communist system collapsed on its own flaws. But former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev acknowledged the crucial influence of John Paul's public support for the Solidarity labor movement in Poland — and his behind-the-scenes negotiations with communist bosses.

John Paul's spiritual legacy stretches far beyond the Catholic Church, said Rabbi James Rudin, coordinator of inter-religious affairs for the American Jewish Committee in New York. That's because John Paul was a pioneer in improving Catholic relationships with the world's other faiths.

In 1986, he became the first pope to visit a synagogue. He embraced Jews as "our elder brothers" and bluntly condemned all forms of anti-Semitism.

Then, in 2001 in Damascus, Syria, he made the first pontifical visit to a mosque and tried to improve relations with Islam.

"He was able to put Catholic-Jewish relations into the mainstream of church life, precisely because he was born in Poland in 1920 and was 19 years old when the Germans occupied his village," Rudin said. "It's precisely because he lived through the Holocaust on the ground in Poland."

A passionate concern for the protection of human life led John Paul to speak out against policies that he believed were threats to life. Through the years, he opposed abortion, capital punishment, nuclear weapons, assisted suicide and the oppression of workers both by communism and uncontrolled capitalism.

Sometimes, his audiences listened: sometimes, they did not. Despite his staunch opposition to artificial birth control, for example, many polls of American Catholics have shown that couples almost unanimously ignored his teaching on that issue. And, though he forbade any discussion of the ordination of female priests, a majority of American Catholics tell pollsters that they think it's not a bad idea.

Richard McBrien, professor of theology at the University of Notre Dame, said, "Catholics have learned to make up their own minds and consciences. They know that some of the pope's teaching has been too narrowly crafted. They know that some of his pronouncements are an Old-World vision that goes back to his history in Poland."

Wojtyla was born May 18, 1920, in Wadowice, Poland, a village 20 miles south of Krakow, and was given his father's first name, Karol. A month later, he was baptized in the 600-year-old, onion-domed St. Mary's Church, across the street from the family's small apartment.

His mother, Emilia, had been a schoolteacher and his father was a retired army officer who approached his faith with the same strict discipline he had employed in military life.

While Emilia dreamed of seeing Karol enter the priesthood — and the boy certainly was successful at school — young Karol had visions of becoming an actor. He joined theatrical troupes at his school and in his community. Soon, he was acting and directing.

A handsome, athletic young man, he also loved sports: skiing, swimming, hiking, soccer and canoeing.

But there also was a somber side to his youth. Death haunted his family. Six years before he was born, his parents had a daughter who died at birth. When Karol was 8, his mother died. When he was 12, his brother Edmund, a doctor, died. When Karol was 20, his father died.

That was 1941, and Wojtyla also was chafing under the loss of his homeland to the Nazis. He continued participating in underground theater, but he saw Jewish friends disappearing, and he knew that his clandestine theatrics could lead to his arrest.

To avoid deportation, Wojtyla worked first in a limestone quarry and, later, in a chemical factory where his strength was taxed with heavy labor.

In the midst of this despair, he discovered the writings of St. John of the Cross, the 16th-century poet who wrote "The Dark Night of the Soul." The spiritual classic describes faith as the only safe guide through the suffering and emptiness of human life. Wojtyla devoured the works of this saint, and the experience led him to enter an underground seminary in 1942.

One famous example of his hard-edged pragmatism came in the early 1960s, long before he became pontiff. At the time, Pope Paul VI asked Wojtyla to join a special group of advisers to study the morality of artificial birth control. Eventually, a majority of the group voted to urge Paul to approve the practice. Wojtyla found himself in the minority, so he privately sent Paul a long paper arguing against artificial contraception.

Not only did Wojtyla's paper convince Paul to reject the majority report, the words were so eloquent that Paul excerpted sections of Wojtyla's text in the encyclical "Humanae Vitae" ("Of Human Life"). Wojtyla had won, and artificial birth control was officially condemned.

Ultimately, John Paul's religious vision was so broad that he invited leaders of non-Christian faiths to help him break down barriers and discuss shared moral teachings.

He was most successful with Jewish groups, Rudin said. "John Paul will be remembered as the pope who permanently put improved Catholic-Jewish relations into the mainstream of the church's teaching. He has declared that anti-Semitism is a sin against God."

He also was warmly received by many Muslim leaders.

"People pay attention to him because of his personal charisma and his long record of consistently upholding the dignity of every human being," said Martin Marty, the nation's leading historian of religion.

"People aren't moved by moralism anymore, they're moved by stories. And John Paul is a dramatic story: the story of a young actor who lived through World War II, of a priest and bishop under communism, of the first Polish pope, of a man who almost was assassinated."

"The Holy Father has touched the heart of the world," Detroit's Maida said. "People may not always agree with his message, but people respect him because, for so many years, he has been the rock of Gibraltar."

Massive plot holes make Ring 2 fall flat

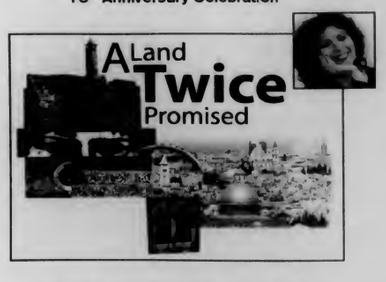
By Jake Monte
Collegian Correspondent

A lot of hype is being attached to the fact that Hideo Nakata, who rose to fame with the Japanese film "Ringu," directed "The Ring 2." "Ringu" was the first film about the lethal videotape that kills you a week after you view it. It's a similar storyline to "The Ring," very similar in fact, but the differences are notable. "Ringu" is not scary. It's not stylized. It's not cool. It's not smart.

And it is only mildly entertaining. It's a technically proficient film which means it's a bit like bread and water for a month. It will keep you alive fine and there's nothing wrong with it, but don't expect it to be fun. Somehow, this seemed sufficient for Japanese audiences, but I think you'll find "Ringu" to be just as dry and bland as I did.

In any event, Nakata is back directing "The Ring 2," and this film is a totally different experience than "Ringu." Shot in a host of bizarre camera angles, with cuts that leap off the screen accompanied by loud sound effects, Nakata has left the tame directorial approach he took to "Ringu" behind. He must have thought American audiences would be bored by the style of "Ringu," and he's right that they would be, but his new style is no better. The great thing about "The Ring" was that it developed slowly beckoning us into it's world. The sequel shouts "look at me" every scene and the audience feels so nagged and annoyed by the directors approach that they never get engrossed in the film.

It must be said that the entire fault of the film does not lie on Nakata's shoulders. The dialogue is forced and unnatural. Even good actors like Naomi Watts, (Rachel Keller,) can't save the scripts numerous awkward lines. Stephen Dorffman who plays Rachel's son, Aiden, leaves no doubt. For him, it's bad acting. The quiet mysterious quality Aiden had in the first film Dorffman has lost with age. The good acting is done by Simon Baker, Rachel's friend, and Elizabeth Perkins, a psychiatrist, both of whom comprise the only good acting in the entire film, because the dialogue makes Watts look so incompetent.



"The Ring 2" has about as many plot holes as films get and more scenes that don't make sense than you'll be able to tolerate. At one point Rachel doesn't know how to get into a strangers home so she searches under three rocks among dozens along side a path and finds a key box embedded in the rock. As the film regresses the questions pile on. Why does Samara's well have a lid on it when it never does when we see it on the T.V. screen? How did the videotape go from Seattle to New Jersey where the characters new home is? How is it possible Samara doesn't know her peanut butter and jelly is being poisoned if she sees everything? Since when can a character go into the T.V. screen and find an entire world, jump off a cliff, and appear back in her home? How does someone climb up the interior of a well made of rocks?

The whole film feels like a cheap imitation analogous to Spam, or bad karaoke. It insults our intelligence with it's simple-minded antics and Nakata, the bad director, becomes the infamous star of the film. Ten minutes in you'll be wondering if you should leave the movie theater and instead just go find some place quiet to twiddle your thumbs.

Rachel Keller (NAOMI WATTS) is learning that there is no place to which she can escape from the evil Samara's cycle of terror and death in the horror thriller 'The Ring Two'.

Illini turning heads

coming back to with the Illini is their unselfishness.

"I saw them on film once they made 19 passes to get the shot they wanted," North Carolina coach Roy Williams said.

Not that the Tar Heels coach, seeking the national title that has eluded him for the last 16 seasons, would trade what he's got.

He is in only the second year of rebuilding a program that went from great under Dean Smith to 8-20 under Matt Doherty. When Roy Williams arrived at his alma mater, he looked at the roster and saw what he had. He called the players in and said they had the talent to make the NCAA tournament in Year One, and to be right where they're at in Year Two.

"I believed it not because of my coaching," he said. "I believed it because of the kids."

The Tar Heels finished the season ranked second behind Illinois in The Associated Press poll. Their meeting in the final is the first between Nos. 1 and 2 since 1975, when UCLA's John Wooden coached his last game against Kentucky.

North Carolina is a 2 1/2-point favorite.

"We're not surprised," Head said. "I mean, people have been saying North Carolina was the better team all year."

McCants, who averages 16 points a game and is never short on confidence, certainly thinks the Illini are stoppable.

"I feel Dee Brown, being as quick as he is, our length will be able to bother him a lot," he said. "And Deron (Williams), as quick as he is, I think Raymond will be able to contain him. Luther Head, as high as he can jump, as fast as he can run, I think I'll be able to defend him."

Dee Brown points down the court after an Illinois basket Saturday night. The Illini defeated Louisville in the Final Four to advance to the finals.

Tundo hooked up with Doyle cutting to the cage, resulting in the first goal of the game.

Morris assisted his second goal but after that, it was all Doyle.

Doyle took it upon himself to get open and put two more goals past the Penn State keeper, his first coming with just under six minutes remaining in the second quarter.

As he ran back to set up for the face-off, whispers of Doyle could be heard from under the umbrellas of those who decided to brave the weather. Even for someone unfamiliar to the team it was clear that, on that rainy day in April, Doyle was the best player on the field.

With time winding down and the game far out of reach, the Minutemen's second string came on the field and held off the opposition, while putting in a few goals of their own. They played with the passion of players fighting for the "privilege" to play on Garber Field, a sentiment Cannella stresses day in and day out.

Doyle stood on the sidelines, eyes transfixed on the field as if he was ready for more, much more. He pumped his fist after every positive play while clenching it as the tides would turn.

When asked about the play of the second team, Doyle didn't hesitate and with an approving smirk mentioned, "Those guys work the hardest, day in and day out. They come ready for practice and it's always good when they can score some goals."

As the Minutemen stare down the barrel of the rest of the season, they will do so with a type of confidence that cannot be seen on a stat sheet. Cannella has his team working as a single unit, garnering results that have UMass at the upper echelon of Division I lacrosse.

Behind it all are players like Doyle, who is unselfish enough to put statistics behind him, yet talented enough to take over a game.

That's the essence of being a captain.

BC soars over UMass

found its stride.

The Eagles came out firing with three unanswered goals between the 14:37 and the 6:10. This tied the game, and by now the momentum had clearly shifted to BC's favor. The Minutewomen seemed shell-shocked, as this game that they were so firmly in control of was slipping away.

The Eagles scored again at the 4:02 mark in the second half to take their first lead of the game as UMass was now forced to answer. After another free position shot sailed wide, there was another foul called against BC, and UMass converted the second chance with 1:09 left in the game to send it to overtime.

The overtime consists of two three-minute periods. It is not sudden death, but scoring first is just as crucial.

UMass won the draw control in the first overtime and Kathleen Typadis had a shot on net just seconds into the overtime. Typadis' shot however, like so many others from the UMass side down the stretch, was saved and BC rode the momentum from that stop to a goal with 2:00 left in the first overtime.

The second overtime started with UMass one goal down and on the ropes. But junior leader Kerri Connerty answered the call with a goal at the 1:45 mark in the second overtime, assisted by freshman Melinda Zwick.

For the last 1:30 there was pandemonium. The ball was loose for most of the time as there was turnover after turnover, the tension mounting with every change of possession.

With 11.1 seconds left the Eagles were charged with an offsides call, giving UMass the ball at the top of the circle and a free look at the net. After receiving a pass, Shelley Boyle put the ball in the net as the sideline erupted, thinking that UMass had the lead. The goal was taken away however by a crease violation.

That was at close as the Minutewomen would get to a victory.

In the third overtime, the Eagles ended the game with a goal with 39.8 left. The disappointment was obvious for the players and coach Bolduc.

"We won draws and controlled the game yet we didn't finish," Bolduc said. "We threw the ball away. We didn't take care of the ball. That's what lost us the game. We just made poor decisions. We outhustled them but we just threw the ball away."

UM breaks records at Garber

It wasn't an easy week for Penn State, as its normal weekly routine was altered stemming from the tragedy that happened to one of its players, Michael Jacober.

Jacober's parents and 15-year-old brother plus three family friends were all killed on March 26 when a single-engine plane that his father, 51-year-old Jeffrey Jacober, was piloting crashed in Benner Township, Pa. The six onboard were on their way to watch the Nittany Lions play Fairfield that day.

Penn State traveled as a team to Rhode Island on Tuesday for the funeral services and arrived in Amherst on Thursday to practice for the game at Garber Field. Jacober didn't make the trip for the game.

The Nittany Lions scored two quick goals from John Eremus and Patrick Heim to take a 2-1 lead over the Minutemen at the 7:02 mark of the first period, but those were the goals PSU would score until the 13:10 mark of the third quarter, a scoreless drought of 23:52, showcasing another stymieing effort by the UMass defense this season.

"They're amazing," Doyle said of the team's defensemen. "Week in and week out they keep us in the game no matter what, no matter how bad the offense is playing."

UMass was helped by two goals each from Doyle and Jeff Zywicki plus solo efforts from Gene Tundo, Pat Larmon, Morris and Recchione on its 8-0 burst that gave the Minutemen a 9-2 halftime advantage.

PSU's Will Jones opened the second half scoring, but the Nittany Lions were never able to get closer than six goals as UMass added four scores over a 4:10 span to push its lead to 13-3.

Chris Doyle notched his fourth of the game during that span, followed by Yaman's first, Larmon's second and Brett Garber's first.

"Obviously, we like a lot of guys to score. It makes everyone happy. It keeps the defense off balance, but when you get a performance out of the midfielders like we did today, a bunch of those guys scored, it helps keep the pressure off Sean [Morris], and Gene Tundo and Jeff Zywicki."

NOTES: The 18 goals were the most scored by an UMass team since March 15, 2003, an 18-6 win over Brown at Garber Field.

Senior Gene Tundo's goal and two assists put him at 99 career points.

Sophomore goalie Ufosa Guobodia saw his first action of the season, playing the final 12:37 of the game in relief of Bill Schell. Guobodia, who made two short relief appearances last year — making one save and allowing no goals — allowed three goals on Saturday and made no saves.

The Minutemen celebrate after a goal during their game against Brown on March 19. UMass won 12-5.

Celtics snap streak against Hawks

By Charles Odum
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Their confidence shaken by a four—game losing streak, Ricky Davis and the Boston Celtics were intent on getting well against the lowly Atlanta Hawks.

With Davis scoring 20 of his season—high 36 points in the second period, the Celtics raced to a 30—point lead in the first half and held off the Hawks 116—100 on Friday night.

The Celtics shot 69 percent from the field in the first half and 60 percent overall, earning praise from coach Doc Rivers.

"This is a great win for us," Rivers said. "I don't know if we could have shot any better. We were as efficient as we could be."

The Celtics pushed their Atlantic Division lead over second—place Philadelphia, which lost to Dallas on Friday night, to four games. The Celtics, who will play the 76ers at home on Sunday, also have regained a one—game lead over Cleveland in the fight for home court advantage in the playoffs.

"We had to win this one," Celtics guard Gary Payton said. "We couldn't go into that game Sunday three games up and make it a battle. We've got to pick it up now."

The Hawks suffered their 11th straight loss, including nine straight at home. They have lost 24 of 25 games.

"Even though they're the last—place team in the league, their guys still came out and played hard," Davis said. "We wanted to come out and bury them early so it wouldn't be close like the last time."

The Celtics escaped with a 95—91 win over the Hawks in Boston on March 9.

On Friday night, Boston led 32—18 after one period and then quickly pushed the lead to 30 points as Davis dominated the second period.

"It's very hard to stop him," said Hawks rookie Josh Childress, who also set his season high with 26 points. "He can stop on a dime and pull up. It's hard to guard him. What can you do about that?"

Boston won 11 of its first 12 games after acquiring forward Antoine Walker from Atlanta on Feb. 24. The streak put the Celtics in control of their division, but Walker shot only 33 percent from the field in a four—game losing streak that left Boston only three games ahead of the 76ers.

UMass pounds Penn State

Minutemen's offense shines

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

In what has grown into a trend this season for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (6-2 1-1 ECAC), the Maroon and White put forth another solid group effort and properly disposed of another one of its opponents.

A season-high 11 Minutemen scored goals in UMass' 18-8 pounding of the Penn State Nittany Lions (2-5 1-1 ECAC) on Saturday in front of 459 fans at a rain-soaked Garber Field.

Massachusetts returns to action at home on Saturday to play ECAC opponent St. John's at 1 p.m.

UMass	18

UMass scored the final eight goals of the second half (12 of 13 overall) during a 29:08 span between the first and third quarters and used a career-best effort from Chris Doyle who tallied five points by way of four goals, tied for his career high, and an assist. Doyle only had four goals and two assists through seven games this season heading into Saturday.

"Our offense was working so well today, and I just got a lot of open looks, a lot of eight-yard shots that you always want," Doyle said. "And the offense played well enough today that I got them a lot of those."

"I'm really happy for him," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "He's been a great leader for us. He's our captain, and I know that he probably feels like he's struggling a little bit, but he's done a lot for us this year, and it's great to see him score and smile and pick up six points. It's just a great performance for him."

Sean Morris, who leads the Minutemen with 20 goals, 10 assists and 30 points, scored a goal and dished out a career-high five assists to tie a career-high six points on the afternoon.

Cannella, who said he was surprised with the margin of victory in the game, was very pleased with his team's focus and attention to certain aspects of the game, especially the face-offs, which the two teams split with 15.

"Our guys came out with a lot of intensity, obviously to rebound from last week, and we did a good job of playing good defense, sound defense, earls the game, and we were able to finish the ball early, which is extremely important for our success," Cannella said.

Doyle shines as a leader

Chris Doyle stood to the side of Garber Field on Saturday afternoon, helmet off, with his eye black running down the side of his face, slightly penetrating his ear-to-ear grin.

Doyle, a senior captain for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, had just had his best game of the season (four goals, one assist) as the Minutemen dominated the Nittany Lions of Penn State 18-8 on a typical rainy day in April.

His friends came over, dressed in garbage bags to protect them from the rain, and patted him on the back as he calmly thanked them for their compliments. He turned to the few reporters that were eager to discuss the game with him and exemplified the mentality that UMass coach Greg Cannella has injected into his team.

He was modest, unselfish and stressed the importance of a team-oriented game.

"Everybody was great out there, we moved the ball around well and got a lot of goal-scorers. The offense was going real well." Doyle mentioned as his friends joked about their buddy getting interviewed.

The word "everybody" is one that Cannella has pounded into his team concept. Even with four Preseason All-Americans (Jack Reid, Sean Morris, Matt Garcia and Doyle) Cannella refuses to separate any of them from the pack. A sentiment reflected by the 11 assists the Minutemen accumulated in Saturday's game.

Cannella, however, was quick to point out that he was proud of Doyle's performance and mentioned that he felt his captain's mentality has been shaken as his stats put up the façade that he was in the midst of a "slump."

Over the first seven games of the season, Doyle had managed only four goals and two assists. However, on Saturday, he showed the Nittany Lions how he earned his preseason honor, right away.

UMass goalie, Bill Schell, cleared the ball after making the first save of the game and attackman Gene Tundo began to set up a play. Nine seconds later,

Minutewomen fall to BC

By Rob Greenfield

WELLESLEY — The day ended in heartbreak for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3-5) Saturday as it lost in double overtime Saturday against Boston College (6-2) under the lights at Babson College.

UMass	13

Missed opportunities were the theme of the day for the Minutewomen, as they had many chances to put the game away down the stretch, but were unable to convert.

UMass worked hard for the entire game to put itself in the position to win. This was the most frustrating aspect of the loss for coach Carrie Bolduc, who felt that UMass let this one slip away.

"We lost composure and let things get into our heads, like the officiating or a bad call," Bolduc said.

UMass and Boston College had not met in six years prior to Saturday's meeting, and they made this game a memorable one. For the Minutewomen, however, it ended on a sour note, as they dropped their fifth game of the season.

The Maroon and White controlled this game early, playing a physical and aggressive game that accented their individual talent — its first three goals were unassisted.

Kathleen Typadis tallied the first score of the game as she knifed through the defense just 14 seconds into regulation for her team-best 18th goal of the season.

Junior captain Lindsay Cassell scored the second goal of the game just over a minute into the action to give UMass a 2-0 lead.

Samantha Sepulvina takes the ball down the field against Hofstra on March 23. Sepulvina scored a goal against BC on Saturday.

Cassell went on to score two more goals in the first half to give the Minutewomen the spark they needed from their captain.

After two UMass goals started the game, Boston College answered with its first goal at the 27:51 mark in the first half.

Just three minutes later, freshman Ashleigh Szawlowski scored a free position goal to give UMass the early 3-1 lead. Szawlowski has come on strong of late, scoring 11 goals in the last five games, good for third on the team.

In the first 10 minutes the Minutewomen dominated the action winning draw controls, beating BC to ground balls, and beating them with quickness. UMass went on to take an 8-6 lead going into the half, with Cassell and Szawlowski both with multiple scores.

The game had yielded to some tight officiating in the first half, with many fouls being called leading to free position shots. UMass converted all four of its free position shots in the first half (4-4) while BC missed some opportunities to capitalize (4-6).

For the first 15 minutes of the second half it was more of the same.

UMass was making quality defensive efforts with stops when it needed them, and it was winning draw controls and controlling the possession of the game. The only problem came on the offensive end.

After an early BC goal in the second half the Minutewomen answered with two of their own by Kathleen Typadis (19) and junior Jackie Nesbitt (5). It was 10-7 UMass with 24 minutes remaining in the second half.

Over the next ten minutes the Minutewomen would bombard the Eagles with a slew shots on goal. Free position shots were rampant on the BC end as UMass had opportunity upon opportunity to push the gas pedal and pull away from BC.

However over this stretch none of the UMass shots found the net and after a 10-minute scoreless stretch, BC finally

Softball postponed

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Due to steady rain that was continual all weekend, the Massachusetts Softball team (11-9-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) did not play its scheduled A-10 doubleheader against Fordham (14-10 4-0 A-10) yesterday; it was postponed until today at 2 p.m. This is the second time these games have been postponed because of the weather conditions, originally supposed to take place on Saturday at Fordham.

This will be the second A-10 match-up the Minutewomen have seen this season, the first being a doubleheader against Dayton on March 26, which they swept.

Fordham comes into today's contest flaunting a six game win streak and four straight conference wins, while UMass split its home opener last Thursday against Dartmouth.

The last time the Maroon and White faced the Rams was in the first round of the 2004 A-10 Championships, which UMass won 1-0. The Minutewomen won every game against Fordham in 2004, including a 14-6 victory last May.

In this long awaited battle, the Minutewomen will have to work against pitcher and 2004 A-10 Rookie of the Year Sarah Kinney, who is 9-5 in 2005 and holds an ERA of 1.88. UMass will depend on senior KJ Kelly to counter Kinney. Kelly is two homeruns away from breaking the UMass record and has a batting average of .346, which leads the team.

Besides Kelly, the lineup for UMass includes senior Denise Denis (leads the team with 18 RBI) and Hillary Puglia (three homeruns). Freshman Lauren Proctor has impressed teammates during her first season. Proctor has nine RBI and is second on the team in batting average with .345.

The pitching duo of senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa will be looking to pick up where they left off. In the doubleheader against Dartmouth last Thursday, the two had 29 combined strikeouts and two runs. LaFogg has a season ERA of 2.49 and has struck out 89 batters in her 15 appearances.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino is confident that this season will not result in same fashion that the 2004 season did when the Minutewomen lost to Temple at home and consequently lost the Atlantic 10 Championship. Sortino was inducted into the NFCA Hall of Fame last year.

UMass has won the past 10 regular season A-10 championships, but Fordham is ranked first in the conference so far this season with its four A-10 wins. The first game begins at 2 p.m. in the Bronx, New York.

Illinois finally earns respect

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — The best team in the country all season is an underdog today. By now, Illinois is used to it.

Even though they've only lost once, have tied the NCAA record for wins and have been ranked No. 1 in the country since December, the Illini (37-1) have had trouble getting their due much of the season.

Never has that been more true than in the buildup to Monday night's championship game, when the Illini face North Carolina (32-4) in a matchup being billed as Team vs. Talent.

Illinois is the "Team. North Carolina has the "Talent."

The Illini say they don't take offense to the comparison. Often during their interviews Sunday, though, they found themselves defending the way they're perceived — as the unsung group of guys who "play the game the right way," compared to Carolina's group of stars.

"We have NBA people at our games every time," Illini coach Bruce Weber said. "We're going to have some guys drafted, whether it's this year or next year. But we don't have quite the names, I guess, and athletic guys that maybe they have."

The reason the Tar Heels get the edge starts with Sean May, the 6-foot-9 center who averages 17.1 points and 10.9 rebounds this season. North Carolina also has Rashad McCants, Jawad Williams and Raymond Felton. They'll all go to the NBA soon, as will the sixth man, freshman forward Marvin Williams.

"They'll have a lottery pick coming off their bench," Illinois forward James Augustine said. "They're obviously more talented. But when it comes down to the situation, it's who's the better team" that will win.

Nobody has won more than Illinois — ever. With their 72-57 victory over Louisville in the semifinals, the Illini matched Duke (1986, 1989) and UNLV (1987) for the most wins in a single season.

Like the Tar Heels, the Illini have stars and NBA talent, starting with guard Deron Williams, a tenacious defender and super ballhandler who may have played himself into the NBA lottery, as well.

Another guard, Luther Head, can shoot 3s with the best, as can Dee Brown, dubbed the "One—Man Fastbreak" for his ability to blow by defenders in the open court. Roger Powell Jr. showed an inside-outside game Saturday — making 3-pointers and lay-ups with equal aplomb — that makes him hard to defend.

But the theme people keep

Millions mourn the Pope

By William J. Kole
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II's body was carried solemnly on a crimson platform to St. Peter's Basilica, past a sea of more than 100,000 pilgrims who waited for hours Monday under a blistering sun for a glimpse of the late pontiff before his funeral and entombment.

Twelve white-gloved pallbearers flanked by Swiss Guards in red-plumed helmets gingerly marched the body from the Vatican's Apostolic Palace, where it had lain in state for prelates and dignitaries, to the basilica for display to the public. Priests chanted the Litany of the Saints.

Incense wafted through the church where John Paul's body will be laid to rest Friday in an ancient grotto holding the remains of popes through the ages, after a funeral to be attended under heavy security by President Bush and dozens of other world leaders. Up to 2 million pilgrims are expected in Rome to pay their final respects.

As cardinals in their red robes and caps filed past the body, bowing and crossing themselves, a long line of faithful, tourists and Romans who had packed St. Peter's Square slowly snaked into the basilica.

Pilgrims gasped, dabbed away tears and snapped photographs as they circled John Paul's body, clad in a scarlet velvet robe, his head

UMass professor speaks on behalf of distinguished series

By Gabriel G. Leiner
Collegian Correspondent

Thomas P. Russell, professor of polymer science and engineering at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, gave the final Distinguished Faculty Lecture, "Small Devices from Long Chains: Polymer and Nanotechnology," yesterday.

Most of Russell's work focuses on nanotechnology, the engineering of particles slightly larger than particles of atomic scale. Proportionately, the size one square centimeter relates to one nanometer as the size of our galaxy relates to one square centimeter. Russell has been able to manipulate matrices of rods on this small scale, and has used various methods, such as spin devices, exposure to light, and to ultraviolet radiation, in order to to "change the morphology and force them [the rods] to self assemble in useful structures."

Russell's research interests include using polymers and block copolymers for the fabrication of nanostructured materials and exploring electronic, magnetic, biological and sensory applications of their use. Russell believes that his research has practical applications to other areas of science, such as high storage densities like computer hard drives, energy science, and biology.

Current computer hard drives function when iron oxide particles "magnetize" in a certain way to encode information, almost like that of a bar code. But with nanotechnology, "you can do the same thins with nanomites for magnetic storage, which operate on the same principles, but have the potential to store much more data," said Russell. "Consider being able to store the data contained on twenty-five digital video discs (DVDs) on a disc the size of a quarter."

In the future nanotechnology may also be able to harness energy more efficiently.

"Fifty years from now life will be fundamentally different and we will not be using cars that depend on oil," said Russell. "Every year we get more than 7,000 times the energy we need from the sun, we just don't know how to process it yet," he said.

"Nature uses photosynthesis, and right now we are trying to create something like that process but the polymer matrices break down." Russell cited research at the University of California that may be able to fix this problem.

The research of Russell and others may lend itself to medicine as well, in that the ability to use morphology of rods in nanotechnology can "manipulate a cell so that it has molecules that form a matrix which allows new

Tunnel system project begins

By Evan Mowery
Collegian Correspondent

The construction of two new underground steam tunnels beginning this month will mark the start of a nearly 100 million dollar reworking of the school's heating and electric systems that will continue until 2008.

"It will be one of the largest projects that the university has undertaken" according to Facilities and Campus Planning project manager John Mathews.

The first of the two steam tunnels and new, underground electric power lines will be installed on the south side of the Campus Center Parking Garage beneath Hicks Way.

The construction of the second set of utility systems, beneath Campus Center Way on the north side of the Parking Garage will begin this July. December 2005 is the expected completion date of this phase of the project, and the landscaping and repaving of areas disturbed by construction is expected to be completed in the spring of the following year. The tunnels will measure 10 feet by 12 feet and will be buried approximately five to 10 feet below the surface.

More construction across campus, from the Parking Garage to North Pleasant Street, will commence next year to rework and expand the more than 50 year old steam piping. Phase 1 of the project will add 500 feet of new tunnels and piping north of the Parking Garage, while Phase 2 coming later on next year will provide an additional 1200 feet of steam pipe and electrical systems — past the Lincoln Campus Center, up to North Pleasant Street.

A brand new, 125,000 square foot Central Heating Plant will be built behind the Mullins Center. The initial construction of this facility began two years ago when 180,000 tons of dirt was moved to the site and left to settle up to two feet, in order to provide adequate working conditions of an area whose deep soils are composed mainly of an extremely malleable clay left over from the glacier and Lake Hitchcock. Contained within the facility's walls will be a state-of-the-art gas turbine, steam turbines, boilers, and water and fuel tanks. Connected with the new system of tunnels, this Central Heating Plant will generate and be responsible for the entire university's steam and electric needs.

Once the steam is produced, It will travel through this network of underground piping to a proposed steam and condensation storage facility, also set to begin construction in the fall, behind the Photo Lab, in the gully.

The function of this two story facility will be to distribute the incoming 13,800 kilowatt, high-voltage electricity from the central heating plant in such a way as to

New apartment style dorms

By Hayden Marx
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is preparing to hire a construction manager to oversee the building of five story apartment-style residential halls located to the west and south of the Sylvan residential area.

Each apartment will have four bedrooms, two bathrooms, a kitchen and a living area. The construction of these dorms will mark the first time since the 1970s that dorms have been built on campus.

The current plan is to complete this project in two phases. The first phase will add 820 to 850 new beds and should be completed by August 2006. Its projected cost is more than $80 million dollars. The second phase will add 650 to 680 new beds and should be completed by September 2007. Combined they will add about 1,500 new beds. James F. Cahill, Director of Facilities and Campus Planning told the Springfield Republican, "The campus would like to have some new beds open by September 2006, but it will all depend on how quickly we can get the construction manager on board."

There are currently six firms with proposals in for the position of construction manager. Suffolk Construction of Boston, Turner Construction of Boston, Gilbane Building Co. of Providence, R.I., Daniel O'Connell & Sons of Holyoke, Dimeo Construction Co. of Providence, R.I., and Clark Construction of Boston.

The job of a construction manager is to supervise and make sure that a building project is completed safely, on time and within budget. What differs on this project is that whoever is awarded the contract will be hired as a construction manager-at-risk. A construction manager-at-risk is named so because they take most of the risk in the building process.

They are paid a fee to work with the architect during the design process. Near the end of the project, they give the client a guaranteed maximum price for the construction. The University benefits from this, in that it does

NEW YORK — The Los Angeles Times won two Pulitzer Prizes on Monday, including the public service award for exposing deadly medical problems and racial injustice at an inner-city hospital. The Wall Street Journal also won two, including one for stories about the plight of cancer survivors.

The Boston Globe's Gareth Cook won for explanatory journalism for detailing the complex scientific and ethical dimensions of stem-cell research.

"The stories wanted to be told," Cook said. "People stepped forward to help me, some anonymously.

"I felt really lucky all year. Everything went right. It was a one-of-a-kind experience."

The Associated Press won for breaking news photography for pictures of bloody year-long combat inside Iraqi cities.

"These folks showed incredible courage this year," AP President and CEO Tom Curley told staffers gathered around the photo desk at AP headquarters. "They took some extraordinary pictures, they captured some incredible moments in history and they did it in a way that made all of us proud."

The Boston Globe's Gareth Cook won for explanatory journalism for detailing the complex scientific and ethical dimensions of stem-cell research.

"The stories wanted to be told," Cook said. "People stepped forward to help me, some anonymously.

"I felt really lucky all year. Everything went right. It was a one-of-a-kind experience."

Nigel Jaquiss, a former Wall Street stockbroker writing for the alternative newspaper Willamette Week of Portland, Ore., won for investigative reporting for revealing former Oregon Gov. Neil Goldschmidt's sexual misconduct with a 14-year-old girl when he was mayor in the 1970s.

"I'm really surprised — it's just a tremendous honor. I never thought it would happen to me," Jaquiss tearfully told colleagues.

The Star-Ledger of Newark, N.J., won for breaking news reporting for stories about the resignation of former Gov. James E. McGreevey after he confessed to adultery with a male lover. Editor Jim Willse said as many as 100 people had participated in the coverage. "We threw everything we had at it," he said.

Bush awards Medal of Honor to soldier

By John Lumpkin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Outnumbered and exposed, Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Ray Smith stayed at his gun, beating back an advancing Iraqi force until a bullet took his life.

Smith is credited with protecting the lives of scores of lightly armed American soldiers who were beyond his position in the battle, on April 4, 2003, near the gates of Baghdad International Airport.

On Monday, exactly two years after Smith's death, President Bush awarded him the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest honor for valor.

"We are here to pay tribute to a soldier whose service illustrates the highest ideals of leadership and love of our country," Bush said in a ceremony in the East Room of the White House. Bush said Smith "gave his life for these ideals in a deadly battle outside Baghdad. It is my great privilege to recognize his great sacrifice by awarding Sgt. Smith the Medal of Honor."

Smith's widow, Birgit, decided that the couple's 11-year-old son, David, would accept the medal on his father's behalf.

"It was a very easy decision for me because, after all, he's the man of the house now," she said Monday. She said she often hears from the men her husband saved, as well as their families. "They're so grateful for what Paul did that day," she said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

It is only the third Medal of Honor given for actions since the Vietnam War, and the first from the Iraq war.

Smith, 33, was the senior sergeant in a platoon of engineers during the 3rd Infantry Division's northward sprint toward Baghdad.

By the morning of April 4, elements of the division had reached Baghdad and captured Baghdad International Airport, a key objective. Encircled Iraqi militiamen and Special Republican Guard forces inside launched counterattacks.

Near the eastern edge of the airport, Smith, a veteran of the first Gulf War, had been put in charge of his unit — 2nd Platoon, Bravo Company, 11th Engineer Battalion — while his lieutenant went on a scouting mission.

Smith's mission was mundane enough — turn a courtyard into a holding pen for Iraqi prisoners of war. The courtyard, just north of the main road between Baghdad and the airport, was near an Iraqi military compound.

Soon after Smith and some of his platoon began work, records show, one trooper spotted dozens of armed Iraqis approaching from beyond the gated walls of the courtyard. Another group of Iraqis occupied a nearby tower.

Smith summoned a Bradley Fighting Vehicle, and he and his troops gathered near the courtyard gate to fight the counterattack. An M113 armored personnel carrier joined the fray.

The Iraqis, perhaps as many as 100, attacked with rifles, mortars and rocket-propelled grenades, or RPGs. Smith threw a grenade over a wall to drive back some of the Iraqis, then fired a rocket.

Incoming RPGs battered the Bradley, which retreated. Then a mortar struck the M113, wounding the three soldiers inside and leaving its heavy machine gun unmanned. After directing another soldier to pull the wounded M113 crewmen to safety, Smith climbed into the machine gun position and began firing at the tower and at the Iraqis trying to rush the compound.

His upper torso and head were exposed as he manned the gun.

"This wasn't a John Wayne move," said Command Sgt. Maj. Gary L. Coker, the top enlisted man in the 11th Battalion, who was near the battle. "He was very methodical. He knew he had the gate and he wasn't going to leave it reduce the electricity to a more manageable, 2,400 kilowatt lower voltage to properly distribute it throughout the university. It will also serve to distribute incoming steam to various steam distribution pipes that serve the entire campus.

Although the production's price tag may well raise questions as to whether the UMass Building Authority is allocating funds to the best of its potential, Mathews says that the completion of this project is essential.

"[The University] has been in need of a [new plant] since 1972."

According to Mathews, the existing central heating plant's equipment is outdated and some special components made in the 1940's and '50's are no longer available on the market. The existing plant has also experienced fires in its pollution control equipment in the last two years.

Perhaps more importantly, the new plant will produce five times as much electricity while reducing the emission of greenhouse gases, nitrous oxides, and sulfur divide.

"[Reducing these gases] will improve the air quality of the Pioneer Valley" says Mathews.

Working closely with Campus Operations and Academic Departments, Facilities and Campus Planning has organized parking alternatives while the construction is taking place. Despite a large majority of work being done in the immediate area, the Campus Center Parking Garage will still be accessible. The primary concern, according to Mathews, is to minimize obstruction of access to the Student Union and Campus Center. Single lane access will be allowed into the garage and the exiting traffic will be detoured down Flint Labratory.

Key child-witness accuses Jackson of molestation

SANTA MARIA, Calif. (AP) — In a halting, emotion-choked voice, the son of Michael Jackson's former housekeeper testified Monday that the pop star molested him during a tickling game in 1990.

The 24-year-old man was called to the stand as prosecutors in the current molestation case against Jackson began trying to show the jury that the singer has a habit of molesting boys.

The witness said that over a span of several years, Jackson twice touched his groin over his clothes during tickling games at Jackson's Los Angeles-area condominium, which he and his mother referred to as "the hideaway," and in a third incident reached under his clothes at Jackson's Neverland ranch.

"We were tickling. He was tickling and I was laughing and the — it was, he was — he was tickling me in the...," the witness said before asking the judge for a break. He wiped his eyes and drank some water.

"He was tickling me. I was wearing shorts again. ... He reached on my leg and I'm still laughing and he reached up to my — privates," the witness said.

As he began to describe the alleged molestation he apologized to prosecutor Ron Zonen for his halting testimony and said: "This took a lot of counseling to get over, just to let you know."

The defense asked that the comment be struck from the record and Judge Rodney S. Melville agreed.

The witness said that Jackson touched him in that incident for two or three minutes and that he remembered thinking, "I should probably go." Asked whom he first told of the incident, the witness said, "Probably God."

crowned with a white bishop's miter and a staff topped with a crucifix tucked under his left arm.

"His face was suffering," said Sister Emma, a 76-year-old Italian nun who saw the pope's body. "I felt a sense of sadness, even though I know he's in Heaven."

Chicago Cardinal Francis George said the cardinals prayed for about one hour before the procession started to St. Peter's. He said it was "quite moving" to see John Paul "laid out as if he were going to celebrate Mass." George said the pope looked "at peace, but a man who had suffered."

"You see the face of death very clearly," he said. "This is a man for whom I'm extremely grateful."

On John Paul's feet were a pair of the simple brown leather shoes he favored during his 26-year pontificate and wore on many of his trips to more than 120 countries — a poignant reminder of the legacy left by history's most-traveled pope.

"I would like to tell him how much I love him," said Lorenzo Cardone, 9, waiting in line with his parents.

Since the pope's death Saturday, St. Peter's Square has been transformed into an outdoor shrine of thousands of candles, farewell letters and notes scribbled on train tickets and tissues fused in puddles of melting candle wax. The scene was reminiscent of the impromptu tributes that swelled in Paris and London after the 1997 car crash that killed Princess Diana.

"Yesterday there was almost nothing here, and now look at it," said Catherine Pech, who drove 12 hours from Switzerland with her husband and daughter to mourn the pope.

Hours before the body was moved to the basilica, the College of Cardinals — meeting in tradition-bound secrecy — set Friday as the date for the funeral in the first of a series of gatherings preceding their secret vote this month to elect a new pope.

It was not clear if they discussed other issues. Chief Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said there were 65 cardinals attending, while the remaining cardinals were heading to Rome.

John Paul will be buried immediately after the funeral, which will include pageantry reserved for the highest prince of the church. The basilica was designed by Bramante and Michelangelo and dedicated in 1626. It was built on the site where St. Peter is believed to have been buried.

Navarro-Valls said John Paul would "almost surely" be buried in the tomb where Pope John XXIII lay before he was brought up onto the main floor of the basilica. John XXIII was moved after his 2000 beatification because so many pilgrims wanted to visit his tomb, and the grotto is in a cramped underground space.

and nobody was going to make him leave it."

Still, Coker said, "it was absolutely amazing to stand up in that volume of fire."

During a stretch of 15 minutes or longer, Smith fired more than 300 rounds as Pvt. Michael Seaman, protected inside the M113, passed him ammunition.

Then he was struck by enemy fire and mortally wounded. At almost the same time, 1st Sgt. Timothy Campbell ended the threat from the tower with a grenade, and the surviving Iraqis withdrew. Medics tried to save Smith, and he died about 30 minutes later.

He and his comrades are credited with killing between 20 and 50 Iraqi soldiers.

Beyond his position were American medics, scouts, a mortar unit and a command post — all lightly armed and vulnerable.

"Sgt. 1st Class Smith's actions saved the lives of at least 100 soldiers," according to an Army narrative.

Smith was born in El Paso, Texas, and moved to Tampa, Fla., when he was 9. He enlisted in the Army in 1989.

He was known for being tough on the men under his command, Coker, who has returned to Iraq with the 3rd Infantry Division, said in a weekend telephone interview.

But Smith held himself to the same standard, Coker said, and he took care of his young soldiers when they needed it. Back in the United States, when one private's wife fell seriously ill, Smith drove four hours to bring toys to their children.

The other two post-Vietnam Medals of Honor went to Army Master Sgt. Gary I. Gordon and Army Sgt. 1st Class Randall D. Shughart, two Delta Force troopers who died defending the crew of a helicopter that was shot down in Mogadishu, Somalia, in events depicted in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down."

More than 3,400 Medals of Honor have been awarded since the decoration was created in 1861, of which more than 600 have been given posthumously.

INTERESTED IN WRITING ABOUT CAMPUS POLITICS?
THE COLLEGIAN IS LOOKING FOR A REPORTER TO COVER SGA MEETINGS. CALL 545 1809 AND ASK TO SPEAK TO ERIKA, JULIE OR DAN

Journalists awarded Pulitzer for writing about patients, families and physicians that illuminated the often unseen world of cancer survivors. The paper's other award went to Joe Morgenstern in the criticism category for movie reviews the judges said provided "insight, authority and wit."

Walt Bogdanich of The New York Times won for national reporting for stories about the corporate coverup of responsibility for fatal accidents at railroad crossings.

Two prizes were awarded for international reporting: Kim Murphy of the Los Angeles Times for her reporting from Russia and Newsday's Dele Olojede for his look at Rwanda a decade after its genocidal civil war.

In awarding the public service citation, the judges praised The Times for "its courageous, exhaustively researched series exposing deadly medical problems and racial injustice at a major public hospital."

Julia Keller of the Chicago Tribune won for feature writing for what the judges said was a "gripping" reconstruction of a deadly tornado that ripped through Utica, Ill., in a matter of 10 seconds.

"This is an example of the Tribune's commitment to storytelling," said Keller, who has been at the newspaper for six years.

Connie Schultz of The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer was cited for what the judges called her "pungent columns that provided a voice for the underdog and underprivileged."

A teary-eyed Schultz wore a tiara and held several bouquets of flowers as colleagues sipped champagne and ate pieces of a cake shaped like an edition of the newspaper. She submitted 10 columns on topics ranging from the Ohio's ban on gay marriage to how managers at a restaurant were taking money from the tip jar at the coat check.

"I enjoy having an opinion," said Schultz, a former reporter who became a columnist two years ago. "I get to report on things that drive me crazy and have an opinion about it."

Tom Philp of The Sacramento Bee won for a series of editorials calling for the restoration of California's flooded Hetch Hetchy Valley in the Sierra Nevada mountains.

"Even in editorial writing sometimes you have to wander way beyond the comfort zone, and this was one of those times," Philp said. He called winning the prize "the thrill of a professional lifetime."

Nick Anderson of The Courier-Journal of Louisville, Ky., won for editorial cartooning for his unusual graphic style that produced "thoughtful and powerful messages," the judges said.

Deanne Fitzmaurice of the San Francisco Chronicle won for feature photography for what the judges said was her "sensitive photo essay" on an Oakland hospital's effort to mend an Iraqi boy nearly killed by an explosion.

"I didn't really think 'Pulitzer' at all while I was working on it, but I was thinking, 'This is the most important story I've ever done,'" Fitzmaurice said. "I feel like it really brought the war home to us."

The AP submitted 20 photos, including one showing an American serviceman trying to draw sniper fire with a helmet designed to look like a soldier; Marines praying over a fallen comrade; and Iraqis celebrating the deaths of U.S. contractors whose charred bodies were hung from a bridge in Fallujah.

Journalists rejoice in their office as they find out that thier newspaper was awarded the prestigious Pulitzer Prize.

Prisoners in Baghdad protest transfer of many detainees

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Prisoners at Iraq's largest detention facility protested the transfer of several detainees deemed "unruly" by authorities, throwing rocks and setting tents on fire in a disturbance that injured four guards and 12 detainees, the military said Monday.

Friday's protest at Camp Bucca — which holds about 6,000 prisoners, nearly two-thirds of all those in Iraq — caused only minor injuries before being brought under control, authorities said. It was the third major incident at an Iraqi prison in three days.

On Monday, a suicide bomber driving a tractor blew himself up close to the infamous Abu Ghraib prison, wounding four civilians in the second insurgent attack around the prison in two days.

Al-Qaida in Iraq said 10 of its fighters died in an assault on the same prison Saturday, while the U.S. military put the insurgents' casualties at one dead and about 50 wounded. Forty-four American soldiers and 13 prisoners were injured in the fighting — the latest in a series of large-scale attacks by insurgents in Iraq.

In an Internet posting, Al-Qaida in Iraq claimed about 20 militants scaled the prison's walls and one of them reached a prison tower and yelled: "God is great!" It said two of its fighters were wounded and 10 were killed, including seven suicide bombers.

The statement, which appeared late Sunday, was impossible to independently verify, and it conflicted with the U.S. account.

The U.S. military denied anyone got inside the prison and said no inmates escaped. It said only one suicide bomber participated, while others fired assault rifles, mortars and rocket-propelled grenades.

A U.S. spokesman, Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, said he did not believe any attackers were captured. He said the wounded insurgents either escaped on their own or were dragged away by other militants.

The military said the insurgents staged simultaneous assaults on multiple locations at the prison, focusing on two guard towers and then using a car bomb to try to penetrate a gate.

Combat helicopters helped push back the attack, which was the largest at Abu Ghraib since insurgents fired mortar rounds into the compound nearly a year ago, killing more than 20 detainees and injuring nearly 100.

Rudisill said prison officials heard an explosion Monday, but he said it wasn't close enough to cause any damage. The blast killed the tractor's driver and injured four Iraqis, police 1st Lt. Akram al-Zubaeyee said.

Abu Ghraib was at the center of the prison abuse scandal last year after photographs were publicized showing U.S. soldiers humiliating Iraqi inmates, including having them pile naked in a human pyramid. The United States holds nearly 3,500 prisoners at Abu Ghraib and about 7,000 elsewhere in Iraq.

Last month, the U.S. military said guards discovered a 600-foot tunnel — dug with makeshift tools — leading out of Camp Bucca, near the southern city of Umm Qasr. The tunnel reached beyond the compound fence, with an opening hidden beneath a floorboard, but no one had escaped, authorities said.

Some Iraqi lawmakers have called for the release of the prisoners at Abu Ghraib, and the National Assembly's newly elected speaker, Hajim al-Hassani, told Al-Jazeera television the topic will be among the first discussed by lawmakers.

"There are some problems regarding the security issue and troubles concerning Abu Ghraib detainees," he said. "These issues will be the main subject we are concerned about in the National Assembly."

President Bush called al-Hassani on Monday to congratulate him on becoming parliament speaker.

"The two leaders expressed confidence that democracy will succeed in Iraq," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said. "The president reiterated our commitment of continued support for Iraq as they move forward."

Iraq's interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, also congratulated al-Hassani, saying his election was "a hopeful sign as you begin the assembly's tasks, including laying down the constitution."

Annual survey rates cheaper airlines as top five carriers

WASHINGTON (AP) — Airlines that offer low fares and provide service to smaller cities are chipping away at traditional large airlines like United and American, say the authors of an annual survey that ranks airline quality.

Five of the six top-rated airlines are low-fare carriers, and regional airlines are making it onto the list for the first time because they now carry enough passengers to qualify.

Brent Bowen, a co-author of the report and director of the University of Nebraska's aviation institute, said the traditional big airlines may just go away, leaving low-fare carriers and regional airlines.

"Five years ago, low-fare carriers had a 5 to 7 percent market share," said Dean Headley, the study's other author and an associate professor at Wichita State University. "Today, the low-fare airlines have a 25 percent share."

Low-fare carriers are succeeding because they have less complicated, more profitable route structures than the traditional airlines, Headley said. That makes it easier to keep customers satisfied, he said.

The Airline Quality Rating study, released Monday, is based on Transportation Department statistics for airlines that carry at least 1 percent of the 650 million passengers who flew domestically last year.

Five of the top six ranked airlines are low-fare carriers. JetBlue Airways was ranked as offering the best service, followed by AirTran Airways, Southwest Airlines, United Airlines, Alaska Airlines and America West Airlines.

Two regional carriers carried enough passengers to be ranked for the first time: Cincinnati-based Comair, a feeder airline owned by Delta, and SkyWest, headquartered in St. George, Utah. Atlantic Southeast, another Delta-owned feeder airline, made its debut on the list last year.

not have to raise funding if the project goes over budget. It also benefits by having all of the people involved together. "It essentially establishes a partnership between the builder, architect and owner," Cahill told the Republican.

"Exactly how many buildings and beds will be added will depend on the market, which hasn't been favorable to the University. The estimates are coming in high. The market is so hot right now. It's the toughest market I've seen in a while," Cahill told the Republican.

But no matter how much housing is created it will be very beneficial for students. Almost ever September for the past few years around 500 students with registered housing have found themselves in temporary housing.

Although some of this trouble comes from students leaving on-campus housing without canceling their housing registration for the next year, a lot of it comes form lack of housing. In a previous interview with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Michael Gilbert, Director of Housing Services said that, "UMass has been accepting a bigger core population than it can accommodate for the last two years." This coupled with the fact that for the last four years more juniors and seniors have chosen to live on campus contributes to the housing squeeze.

Malnutrition doubles in Iraq

Mike Sances

The curious contradiction was first pointed out to me two years ago in an American foreign policy discussion section. Social conservatives, the teaching assistant observed, have no qualms sentencing someone to death, but rabidly oppose abortions of any sort. At this I laughed, until I heard the flipside: social liberals vehemently oppose the death penalty, but will not object to an abortion within reason.

The contradiction disappears, however, when the two issues — abortion and the death penalty — are viewed not as matters of life and death, but of social freedom and social control.

Juan Cole summed it up best at the end of last week, noting the oddity of a March 31 press conference where the president shifted seamlessly from expressing condolences on the passing of Terri Schiavo to addressing a new report on the failures of prewar intelligence.

Denouncing the press conference as "a sort of Public Relations grave robbery, and among the blackest moments in the history of the presidency," and incredulously trying to reconcile the phrase "culture of life" with one of the most belligerently militaristic presidents this country has ever seen, Cole concludes that the pro-life movement "is not about life at all. It is about social control. It helps establish a hierarchical society in which men are at the pinnacle and women kept barefoot, pregnant and in the kitchen."

While Cole may be generalizing a bit too far when he compares Michael Schiavo to a mother carrying an unwanted pregnancy, his refraining of the debate into one between patriarchy and pluralism makes sense.

While Cole may be generalizing a bit too far when he compares Michael Schiavo to a mother carrying an unwanted pregnancy, his reframing of the debate into one between patriarchy and pluralism makes sense.

It also explains the contrast between the national hysteria (according to the media, anyway — polls show most of the country opposed the government's intervention in the affair) over "starving" a brain-damaged woman in Florida and the tragic news last week that the number of children suffering from malnutrition in Iraq has "about doubled" since the American invasion began. Jean Ziegler, who heads the Right to Food Office of the United Nations Human Right Commission, directly blamed the invasion for his report's conclusions.

Needless to say, such figures, unlike flying back to the White House from Crawford in the middle of the night, do not make for good public relations. That is why you probably didn't hear about it, and if you did, the headline was likely something along the lines of "U.S. rejects malnutrition claims." Witness the impenetrable response to the report by the American ambassador to the U.N. in Geneva: "First, [Ziegler] has not been to Iraq, and second, he is wrong."

Apparently this is all that is required for the story to be deemed a non-issue by the vast network of corporate mouthpieces misnamed "journalists." Never mind that the U.N. report was based, in part, on American and European studies — or that this was actually the second time the state of Iraq's children had been so defined.

As it happens, the Washington Post had already broken this story last November, though then the number had "almost" doubled. "After the rate of acute malnutrition among children younger than five steadily declined to four percent two years ago," wrote Karl Vick, "it shot up to 7.7 percent this year, according to a study conducted by Iraq's Health Ministry in cooperation with Norway's Institute for Applied International Studies and the U.N. Development Program. The new figure translates to roughly 400,000 Iraqi children suffering from 'wasting,' a condition characterized by chronic diarrhea and dangerous deficiencies of protein."

Note that the interim government appointed by then-proconsul Paul Bremer corroborates the figures in November. A search for an official American response to the earlier report came up empty.

Where are the acts of civil disobedience practiced by the ardent "supporters" of Terri Schiavo outside the Florida hospice?

Where is the opening of American hearts and wallets, like that which we saw in the aftermath of the Asian tsunami?

Remember that this particular atrocity is but one of the innumerable horrors of war that we have vested upon the people of Iraq. Thus, we come upon another contradiction, not between death and life, or slavery and freedom, but between those disasters we create and those we do not. What's happening in Iraq today is something that you, I and everyone else in this country bear direct responsibility for.

Why Americans will go out of their way to alleviate the suffering of some, but refuse to lift a finger toward compelling our government to simply terminate ongoing crimes against human beings no less innocent, is a question I leave for the reader to mull over.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

A stroll outside the cave

Yousef Munayyer

Every week, I usually write about politics in the Middle East and specifically the conflict in Palestine. I do this not only because it is a subject near and dear to me, but also because the point of a column is to provoke thought and discussion. Since conflict exists because of misunderstanding, we can begin to solve these issues by talking about them. What I hope people will do is to think about certain issues in ways they may have not thought of them before.

Everyone has a particular stance on an issue. Everyone has an opinion. However, not all opinions are valid. This is not to say that only my opinion on an issue is correct. Rather, what I am trying to explain is that I reject any opinion not based on educated reasoning. This does not necessarily amount to a careful study of history and the politics of an issue, but also the careful understanding of other views.

I cannot begin to tell you how many weak arguments I hear because they are only repeated rhetoric. The strongest and most persuasive arguments I have heard are by those who willingly acknowledge the opposing argument and use that knowledge to reshape and strengthen their opinion.

Before I lose you in this sea of logical theory, let me explain what prompted this introduction. This past week, like most, I received a few e-mails to my student account about my column. Those who write sometimes disagree and sometimes agree wholeheartedly with me. However, even though some feedback may be very critical, I consider them all positive. At least they are reading.

From the rhetoric and clichés that appear in some of the critical e-mails, I can tell almost exactly what the person has been reading. Everyone is, of course, a product of their environment. The opinions that I consider to be valid, however, come from those who dare to leave that protective environment which they have been confined to since birth, and have ventured outside of their proverbial cave.

If an individual, after having entertained the arguments of others and having seen what exists outside of their respective bubble, still finds grounds to believe in their original opinion, I can respect that, but I reject someone who argues and refuses to broaden their horizon. In fact, I feel sorry for them.

At a University like ours, the mind is supposed to open up to new ideas, but some remain sheltered. I feel most sorry for those who spend four years here (and in some cases five, six or seven), and never really learn anything.

At a university like ours, the mind is supposed to open up to new ideas, but some remain sheltered. I feel most sorry for those who spend four years here (and in some cases five, six or seven), and never really learn anything. For them, their university experience exists on the paper which makes up their degree but their mind remains as enclosed and unexercised as the day they walked in.

One correspondence I had this week was particularly telling. After a short barrage about bias and balance in the first e-mail I received, I replied by first thanking the reader for their response and asking them to be more specific. In reply to this, my critic, writing in a somewhat frustrated tone, had ended his/her e-mail by asking if I had ever been to Israel.

I smiled ear to ear when I read that last line. I was happy to respond to this inquiry by talking about my personal history. I told my critic about how I was born in Israel and carry an Israeli passport and citizenship. I went on about how I have traveled throughout Israel, from its major cities to its minor ones, meeting and talking with the people in the country. Also, I noted that as an Arab with American citizenship, I had the opportunity to travel to the occupied territories which is a perspective very few Israelis can claim to have.

What was most interesting about this last e-mail was the fact that I did not receive a reply from my critic. I can only assume that he/she had never entertained the possibility of my background and had realized how close-minded he/she was. I must admit I was somewhat disappointed not to hear back, but I hope that this incident caused my critic to think about their preconceived notions and where they come from. Perhaps this will lead to their eventual awakening.

It is vital to reiterate the principle of conflict resolution through understanding. If you walk through life with the preconceived notions of your childhood, you will only grow physically and pass away having never grown mentally. This is why I believe it is especially important to discuss and debate issues which we do not agree upon.

The conflict in Palestine is my main focus and anyone who wants to learn more about my perspective should let me know. Perhaps we will part in disagreement, but at least we will have learned from each other.

With senior year comes apathy

Elizabeth Joyce-Brandt

All I want to do lately is hang out. I want to literally sit around all day with my friends and do nothing but laugh and it's beginning to become a problem. Sure, laziness is the way of life for many college students, but I have taken mine to a whole new level. I've become impossibly irritated with anything that requires my attention such as homework or class. Waking up before 11 a.m. is a real struggle for me, which is problematic due to the fact that I have 9 a.m. classes.

I am no longer the girl who faithfully does her homework before it's actually due. Usually, I'm scrambling to finish it on the bus or in the first 15 minutes of class. I'm not the annoying girl who corrects the professor's use of grammar or spelling on the whiteboard. Instead, I'm the annoying girl who is making up horrible poems about the professors pants (roses are red, violets are black, Professor Perkins is wearing corduroy slacks).

My room is in constant disarray and I've been wearing dirty clothes for the past two weeks. Normally, people with common sense would be bothered by all of these factors. The fact that I am constantly sweating out a homework assignment, looking homeless or annoying classmates should bother me, but they just don't. Instead, I just laugh it all off, chalking it up to senioritis. But could it be more? Could I really be losing my mind just months shy of graduation?

I've seen this happen to friends of mine. A little identity crisis before taking the big leap from the college world to the real world. I've heard of students acting completely out of character in their last semester of college, throwing caution to the wind and doing crazy things. I never thought it would happen to me, but here I am, on the brink of becoming crazy.

I never thought it would happen to me, but here I am, on the brink of becoming crazy.

I used to be a fairly smart girl, filled with some useful knowledge about the world around me. I used to be able to hold a riveting conversation without forgetting what I was talking about half way through. This is no longer the case, my friends. Now, I forget what I'm talking about mid-sentence. I'm filled with useless knowledge thanks to shows like "I Love the 90's" and "Best Week Ever."

I now hold conversations about replacing Cory Matthews' little sister on "Boy Meets World" and can keep you up to date with the Michael Jackson trial or tell you how Oprah lost her weight. But if you ask me to help you with a math equation, we're both in trouble. I am obsessed with things that are completely absurd, like my tweed jacket, every Will Ferrell movie, anything pink and French braiding my friend Karl's hair. I can't help it, on a good day I'm working with three brain cells, max.

I have this sneaky feeling that I'm not alone though, so I guess this long winded rant is just a cry for help. Somebody please help me get my brain back before I am released into the real world with absolutely no clue as to what the hell I should be doing. I am afraid that if I am "freed" while in such a delicate state, something horrible will happen. I guess until I get help, I will just be sitting on my couch, laughing at my situation and wondering what is going to really happen come May 22.

If steroids were legal in sports

Chris Sweeney

Congress, mass media and all of Major League Baseball have been consumed by the steroids scandal. Everyone is seeking to rid the MLB of these performance-enhancing drugs and move beyond the problem. However, as far as I'm concerned, the approach to rid the MLB of steroids is an entirely inappropriate solution to the problem.

The MLB and the American public should embrace steroids as a step towards a higher form of entertainment. Lets face it, we've all enjoyed seeing records being smashed recently, and when Bonds steps up to the plate, there's always a bit more excitement. Just imagine what the game of professional baseball would be like if all the players were juiced up.

Steroids could push baseball beyond any form of entertainment we've ever seen, and isn't that the top priority of any professional sports association, fan entertainment?

If the MLB provided a choice for players to inject themselves with all types of human growth hormones, the competition would be savage. Those who are so dedicated to winning would use medical science to become Goliath-type figures and crush the ball 700, 800ft from home plate. The home run derby over all-star weekend would be an unprecedented display of hitting ability. Stadiums would be sold out constantly, filled with eager fans hoping to catch one of the many upper-deck home runs.

Though if all players began adopting steroids, hitters would not have it so easy. Outfielders could become faster, and increase their leaping abilities, leading to more robbed home runs. Shortstops and basemen could increase their reaction times, triple plays would not be so rare and acrobatic throws and catches would be the norm.

It gets better though. Pitchers could develop their arms into machines capable of throwing in the triple digits for long stretches. The already amazing natural ability of these men would be enhanced to such a level that entire games would become highlight reels. So many of the players are already so dedicated to winning, that mixing the strenuous mental effects of steroids could add a seriously entertaining psychological aspect to the game of baseball.

We've all seen players kick over the occasional water cooler, scream at teammates or get into it with a fan. I would like to see how they deal with these stresses under the influence of numerous adrenaline increasing, genital shrinking substances.

The peak of excitement during a steroid-fueled baseball game would have to be when a bench-clearing brawl would break out. Twenty or so mammoth men engaged in a vicious fight, armed with bats and some protected with helmets. Imagine if Pedro was "roid raging" when he tossed Don Zimmer to the ground. Sure, the networks and players claim to be ashamed of brawls, but every fan gets a certain kick from seeing some kicks and punches in a baseball game. Steroids could push baseball beyond any form of entertainment we've ever seen, and isn't the top priority of any professional sports association, fan entertainment?

I admit that I have made some assumptions about the ability of steroids that may not be possible. Also, I realize that steroids could lead to some serious health issues that could shorten or end an athlete's life. That is why the MLB should invest in creating medical science teams dedicated entirely to the creation of steroids that could enhance specific abilities and not be so damaging to the body. If scientists can grow a human ear off the back of rat, I think they can develop some pretty insane steroids.

As reality television begins its race to the bottom, steroid-enhanced sports should be the next genre to captivate millions. The big names are already there; fans have most favorites and least favorites; age long rivalries already exist. Let's just help baseball take a step into this modern world with a little injection of medicine. Hell, maybe steroids could even bring the NHL back to life. That game already allows fighting and has amazing athletes flying around on ice, equipped with sticks and pads. Talk about entertainment.

Anne Frank

The Diary of a Young Girl in Pictures

By Aline Mendelsohn
The Orlando Sentinel

ORLANDO, Fla. In the photographs, they are an ordinary family of four.

Here is Edith in 1931, cradling her baby girl. Here is Margot in 1938, standing on the beach in her bathing cap. Here is Anne, posing in a frilly costume before a birthday party in 1934.

Nothing foreshadows the terror they will experience. Nothing betrays the fact that, in a few years, Edith, Margot and Anne Frank will be dead.

The images of the Frank family are featured in "Anne Frank: A Private Photo Album," currently on display at the Holocaust Memorial Resource and Education Center of Central Florida in Maitland.

The exhibit, on display until May 31, features more than 70 copies of photos of the Franks before they hid from the Nazis for two years in an Amsterdam attic.

"The power of it is that it's not Anne as the icon we have come to know. It's Anne as little sister, as the youngest in the family," says Mary Geary, director of development for the Anne Frank Center USA in New York. "We see them in these precious moments, when life held promise, the promise that every family feels when children are young and have potential."

Anne Frank's father, Otto, was a businessman who loved photography. He took dozens of pictures of his family.

As much as possible, Anne's parents tried to shield their children from the worsening news about the condition of Jews. So after the war started, photos of Anne and Margot show them doing normal things: sunbathing, sleeping, doing schoolwork.

Anne, who collected photos of movie stars, loved having her picture taken, says Ryan Cooper, who befriended Otto Frank in the early 1970s. As she posed for many pictures, she tilted her head in a way that shows she was both conscious of, and comfortable with, the camera in front of her.

"She was a very sprightly, bubbly girl," says Pieter Kohnstam, who was Anne's neighbor in Amsterdam and now lives near Sarasota, Fla. Anne was seven years older and would sometimes baby-sit Kohnstam. "She was a little bit of a dreamer, fantasizing about actors and clothes."

This specialist says new dietary guidelines can be achieved

By Lisa Liddane
The Orange County Register

Since the new dietary guidelines were issued in January, some health experts have been expressing concern that some of the exercise recommendations may be too steep.

They worry that setting such expectations may intimidate people and make them want to give up before they try.

Here's a recap of the exercise guidelines:

Reduce the risk of chronic disease in adulthood by participating in a moderate-intensity physical activity at least half an hour a day most days of the week. Long periods of more vigorous exercise are better.

Prevent gradual weight gain in adulthood by participating in an hour of moderate to vigorous activity most days of the week while keeping calories constant.

If you've lost weight, maintain the weight loss in adulthood by participating in an hour to 1 1/2 hours daily of moderate-intensity physical activity while keeping calories constant.

The guidelines that call for 60 minutes to 90 minutes are what some people find unrealistic. Call me an optimist, but I think that what's missing is encouragement and advice to help people actually get there.

Shouldn't health experts be showing people that the road to the 90-minute workout is long and starts with small steps, whether you're trying to maintain weight loss or simply build your total fitness?

Take it from someone who's been there. I didn't grow up playing sports and didn't discover the joy of physical activity until about 12 years ago. I joined a gym for preventive health reasons when a friend told me about a two-for-one sign-up promotion. I started with 20 minutes of walking, then running on a treadmill. After about a month of doing this several times a week, I was running half an hour. I took my running outdoors and eventually participated in 5Ks. I also started taking other classes such as hip-hop, cardio kickboxing, boot camp and Spinning. I'd get to the gym half an hour before a class and strength train, then take an hour-long cardio class.

It was one of the best things I've done for my health. Exercise made me feel much more alive and gave me energy, so that I began to look forward to being active.

My husband introduced me to road cycling, and we'd go for rides that lasted several hours in Orange and Los Angeles counties. In turn, I introduced him to indoor cycling. In our pre-baby days, we were physically active two hours a day, longer on weekends, and having a lot of fun along the way.

If dropping unhealthy pounds and maintaining weight loss are your objectives, remember that 60 minutes to 90 minutes are long-term goals. It will take awhile to get there, and you have to take baby steps before you can run. First, choose activities you enjoy. Shoot for 15 minutes, then eventually half an hour. As you develop cardiovascular endurance, add another 10 minutes to 15 minutes. Keep a workout log to track your progress. Be patient with yourself, and appreciate the gradual progress you're making.

Many felt the new dietary guides issued this year were to steep, and may scare people away from keeping up with their health. Liddane says that a slow but steady approach is best.

Son of Knievel: Reality TV

Robbie's 'Wild Ride' now an A&E show

By Jean Prescott
Knight Ridder

Turn your back for a few months, and squatters, notably the Gotti family and "Dog the Bounty Hunter", move into the cable-network home of Jane Austen's reluctant lovers Elizabeth Bennett and Mr. Darcy.

Bye-bye costume dramas, hello reality TV.

Joining those interlopers Tuesday on A&E is a new series that would be of a kind with its predecessors if it weren't for the enigmatic star of the show, second-generation daredevil Robbie Knievel.

Yes, son of Evel, leaper of cars, canyons and such. He smiles broadly, laughs easily and seems to thrive on the attention brought his way by "Knievel's Wild Ride" (10 p.m. ET Tuesdays on A&E).

"Yeah, they just follow us around," he said by phone from a hotel room somewhere in Manhattan last week. "We don't do anything special for them. They want this to be real, and it is real, if you saw it.

"There's a lot of bleeping."

Indeed, the unscripted conversations, one in particular after a biker bar scrap, are nothing if not long strings of bleeps.

It's all part of the panoply, a pageant that stretches all the way back to the gladiators, Knievel says. "Men needing to prove themselves. The cowboys in the old West, too. It's all part of the same thing," and he can't imagine doing anything else. "I've had those hard-labor jobs. No thanks."

He laughs, then sobers at the thought of his dad, from whom he has been estranged but recently reconciled: "I look at him sitting on his bus before an appearance. He's in pain, he's doing oxygen (the elder Knievel has a debilitating lung disease), and I ask him, Dad, why do you keep doing this to yourself?' He says he just loves his fans."

It's not about the mechanics or the engineering or even the achievement, the younger (he's 40-something) Knievel says. "They talk about technology today, but things can still go wrong. You can still black out from G-forces, and it only takes a few seconds. No, it's about the people, and the more the better. I like it when it looks like an ocean of heads. It makes it easier to perform.

"My little girl (18-year-old Krysten Knievel; you meet her in episode two) has got a taste of it, and she's hooked, too," but not on speed and danger. She sings the National Anthem at her dad's performances.

Knievel says people always ask him if he considers himself a daredevil. "So I finally looked it up, and I guess I am bold and reckless like it says. I grew up with a pretty wild father, did my first jump when I was 10 because I just wanted to live up to the name.

"I don't have a death wish, but if I die, I don't want it to be from liver disease."

Knievel will have close to 10 chances to tempt fate this year, most of them on "Knievel's Wild Ride."

Jane Austen must be twirling in her grave.

The infamous daredevil Evel Knieval's son, Robbie has started where his father left off. He will star in his own reality TV show, "Knievel's Wild Ride" which will air on A&E this season.

Cybill Shepherd isn't afraid to speak out about constipation

By Carolyn Poirot
Knight Ridder

FORT WORTH, Texas — What's a glamorous superstar like Cybill Shepherd doing here in Fort Worth, early in the morning, talking about constipation before she jets off to Toronto to film a new two-hour CBS television movie about Martha Stewart?

"It's important to get women talking about IBS (irritable bowel syndrome) with constipation," says Shepherd, yawning as she leans back in one chair, her feet, clad in raspberry pink metallic sneakers, up in another. "Six million women suffer from it."

While Martha herself might be the last person to bring up the subject of constipation in polite company, Shepherd, who also played Martha in a 2003 NBC Movie of the Week, "Martha, Inc.," says she has always been outspoken, some would say irreverent, when it comes to health issues affecting women.

"I've been talking about unmentionables for 30 years," Shepherd says. "My first real cause was reproductive freedom, and it still is, but I also helped bring menopause out of the closet. Long before the big controversy over HRT (hormone replacement therapy), I talked about menopause and periods and ways to deal with them on 'Oprah.' In fact, I once walked up to a group of women I hardly knew at a party and said, 'So, about menopause, how's it going with you?' Everybody quit talking and started backing away."

Now, Shepherd is traveling the country talking about IBS with constipation (as opposed to IBS with diarrhea) and Zelnorm, a prescription drug to treat the abdominal pain, bloating and chronic constipation that IBS can cause. She is a spokeswoman for the "Amazing Women" campaign, designed to empower women to seek proper diagnosis and treatment for recurring constipation. Shepherd's tour is sponsored by Novartis Pharmaceuticals, the company that developed Zelnorm.

"I tell women to talk to everyone, your family and friends and mothers and sisters and especially your doctor, even if it is embarrassing," Shepherd says. "I was misdiagnosed for 20 years. My doctor told me it was nothing. It was psychological, all in my head. There's nothing to make you go crazy like being told that pain is all in your head . . . The bloating was so bad that sometimes a costume wouldn't fit from day to day and I would just have to leave it unzipped in back."

She finally went to a new doctor who correctly diagnosed IBS about two years ago.

Traditionally, diagnosis of IBS with constipation has been a problem simply because patients are reluctant to talk about it.

"It's not that it is difficult to diagnose, but people don't talk about their bowels much with their primary care physicians," says Dr. Stephen Furs, a gastroenterologist who participated in a double-blind clinical study on Zelnorm at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. "Doctors weren't asking, and patients weren't volunteering the information needed for proper diagnosis.

"It's not that IBS with constipation is underappreciated, it's just that it can't be readily explained," says Furs. "For years, we attributed it to unresolved stress. That's how it got the reputation for being 'in your head.' We treated it with high-fiber diets and fiber supplements and laxatives, but in most studies those treatments were no better than placebo. I would say about three out of four of my patients who are properly diagnosed get significant relief with Zelnorm." He notes that he has been prescribing the drug since it came out in fall 2002.

"Nothing helped all the symptoms until I got on the right medication," Shepherd says, trying to suppress another yawn as she twirls the office chair she is sitting in around and asks her assistant for a bottle of water and a hard-boiled egg white to help her through the early-morning interview.

"You know it's 5:20 my time (in Los Angeles), and I've been up and at this for a couple of hours already," she points out.

Still, she appears none the worse for the hectic schedule and says that at 55, "it's too late to start lying about my age now" she's feeling better than ever before.

"I've been singing and dancing (on stage) for the first time ever at the Soho Theater in London," says Shepherd, a stage, movie and television actress who recalls dancing on the toes of her father's wingtip shoes, by the time she could walk and singing in her church choir from age 8.

The one-woman show is based on her book, "Cybill Disobedience: How I Survived Beauty Pageants, Elvis, Sex, Bruce Willis, Lies, Marriage, Motherhood, Hollywood, and the Irrepressible Urge to Say What I Think." Published five years ago, the book was on The New York Times bestseller list for seven weeks and will be republished in May. Shepherd hopes to bring the show to New York next fall.

"It doesn't really matter if it's on Broadway, I just need a dance floor," she says. "I once wanted my epitaph to read, 'Dancevery chance you get,' but now I want it to say, 'We'll make this a comedy yet.'"

Outspoken actress Cybill Shepherd has never been inhibited when it comes to speaking her mind about womens issues.

Millers graphic novel 'Sin City' comes to life on the big screen

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Correspondent

"Sin City" is ridiculous. It's a movie that relies on ridiculous voiceovers, ridiculous analogies all pulled off with ridiculous seriousness. But if you can get past that, or better yet, if you can appreciate and enjoy that, then "Sin City" is ridiculously fun.

Robert Rodriguez's movie is actually three movies and it's actually Robert Rodriguez, Frank Miller and Quentin Tarantino's movie as all three shared directing duties. "Sin City" is bookended with the story of Hartigan (Bruce Willis), a beat up, brooding cop with one last crime to solve. If this description sounds like one of those old-time film noir stories then that's because it is. As the movie begins Hartigan is trying to save an eleven year old girl named Nancy from the pedophilic son of a politician. The movie wraps up with Hartigan trying to save a 19-year-old Nancy played by Jessica Alba once again. This is the most personal segment in the film and it frames the movie perfectly.

The middle segment, which is the best part of the film, features a great performance by Mickey Rourke who plays Marv, an ex-con who finds a dame worth dying for. To avenge her death Marv will "kill his way to the truth," as he says by tracking down a silent but deadly cannibal (Elijah Wood) and a corrupt and powerful Cardinal (Rutger Hauer).

The weakest, but still solid, third of the movie is the one about Dwight (Clive Owen), a soft-spoken yet entirely dangerous man who attempts to save Old Town for the prostitutes who run it (Rosario Dawson, Devon Aoki and Alexis Bledel). This is the part of the movie that features Quentin Tarantino's directing as he films a surprisingly violent confrontation between Dwight, the prostitutes of Old Town and Jackie Boy (Benecio Del Toro), a cop whose actions will compromise the truce of Old Town.

'Sin City'
Directed by Robert Rodriguez Frank Miller
Starring Bruce Willis Jessica Alba Clive Owen Benecio Del Toro
Dimension Films
Grade A-

The three segments are loosely connected plot wise, but they are binded together stylistically and thematically. Each are filmed entirely in black and white with splashes of red, blue, green or gold thrown in for good measure. Upon leaving the theatre you really get a sense of this city that Frank Miller so vividly created in his graphic novels.

The acting is actually quite impressive considering the filming and genre of the movie. The movie, much like last year's "Sky Captain and the World of Tomorrow," was filmed almost entirely through HD green screen technology, so the actors had to place themselves in the scene mentally while they were acting in front of a large green backdrop. On top of that, the film-noir style presents actors with a difficult task. They have to be completely over the top serious and unrealistically tough without it being hokey.

Some of those in "Sin City" actually thrive under these two difficult conditions. Bruce Willis, for one, gives an effective and enjoyable performance. Others do not. It is evident from the five or so minutes that Josh Hartnett is on the screen that he lacks the necessary machismo that a movie of this style requires. The voice cracking ruins the illusion of him being a bad, scary man. Jessica Alba also struggles, but her excuse is a little more acceptable: she's just not a very good actress.

Alba and Hartnett are the exception. The cast, which is too jam packed to even begin to list, really seems to get Frank Miller's vision and it comes through on screen.

Rodriguez created a movie for the fans: the fans of his other movies, the fans of Frank Miller, the fans of comic books in general. The problem might be that those outside of these categories will not appreciate the movie. But the fact remains that Rodriguez, Frank Miller and Quentin Tarantino made a movie for their fans and sacrificed nothing in doing so and I find that refreshing.

Frank Miller's graphic novel, "Sin City," has been a longtime favorite of fans within the genre. Stars like Jessica Alba, Bruce Willis, Josh Hartnett, Brittany Murphy and Mickey Rourke help bring it to life.

Pictures of Anne

In "Anne Frank: Beyond the Diary," Ruud van der Rol and Rian Verhoeven recount how Anne placed photos inside the red-and-white checked diary she received for her 13th birthday. Next to one, she wrote, "Gorgeous photograph, isn't it!!!!"

Edmond Silverberg, who lives now in Hackensack, N.J., met Anne through his cousin in 1942, when he was 16 and she was 13.

At that age, three years is a big age difference. Silverberg's parents thought he should see girls his own age. But he says talking to Anne was like being with someone his age, and he enjoyed spending time with her.

They didn't have many recreational choices. Going to movies, riding bikes and using public transportation were verboten for Jews. Instead, the pair went for walks in their neighborhood and talked for hours about their families and friends.

Silverberg saw Anne on a Sunday morning in July and returned to her house that afternoon.

He rang the doorbell.

There was no answer.

"We lived at a time when people just disappeared," Silverberg says. As Silverberg walked away, he hoped the Frank family had found a safer place to stay. But the thought also crossed his mind: He might never see Anne again.

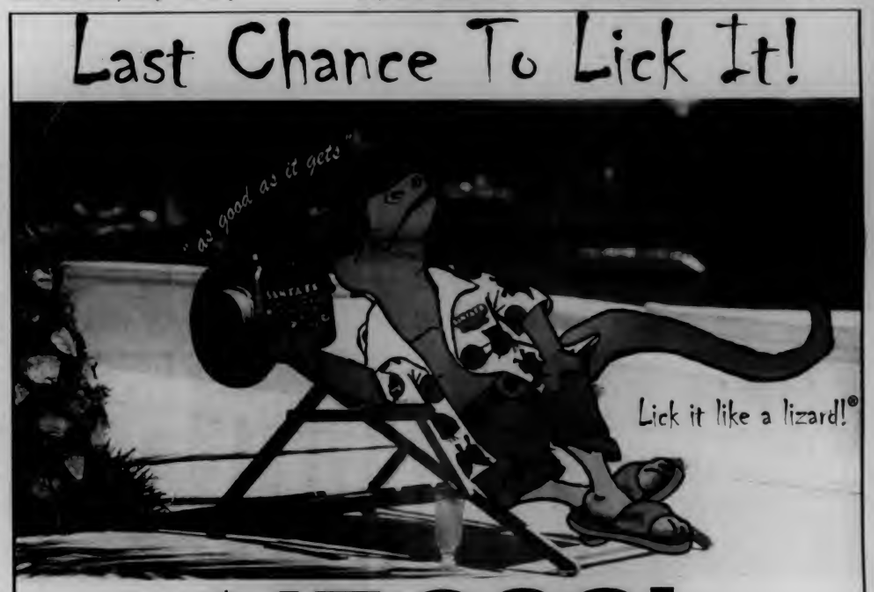
It was around that time that the Franks and another family went into hiding.

After two years, the Franks were arrested and sent to concentration camps.

Only Otto Frank survived.

After the war, Otto Frank recovered Anne's diary and the four photo albums.

Cooper remembers paging through the albums with him. Otto Frank didn't say much as he looked at the photographs.



"He remembered the past but he dwelled in the present," says Cooper, who lives in Massachusetts.

Officials at the Anne Frank Center do not know of any photographs taken of the Franks while they were hiding.

The photos taken before then "set the stage for knowing how an ordinary family lived," says Chris Gordon, an English professor at St. Cloud State University in Minnesota.

Moshe Pelli, director of the Judaic Studies program at the University of Central Florida, says the pre-war photos bring a sense of authenticity to the Franks' plight.

"We're talking about real people," Pelli says. "Not just names or nameless individuals or numbers tattooed on the arm. Real people, and they had real lives."

Alice helps UMass on and off the sidelines

can't let anything compromise your fiercest weapon.

Growing up on a farm is also why you'll see her outside in the freezing cold towards the end of football season, or why she'll happily brave the spring rains to watch the men's lacrosse team demolish the opposition, as she did this Saturday.

"I love athletics, I love sports, and I love being outside," she says.

What really is impressive about Alice isn't her hardy attitude towards the conditions, but the fact that she's there for the team, win or lose. When the hockey team was struggling to break the 2,000 mark five years ago for game attendance, she was always present, and always cheering.

"Forget the past, tonight's a new game!" she smiles. It's obvious that this is a woman not likely to miss any upsets here at UMass anytime soon.

Her talents extend further than lung power, however. Longevity is one of her more amazing traits, as Alice will be receiving an award this summer from the university for 25 years of service as a secretary. The University should thank her for far more than that.

They should thank her for being someone who truly loves this University, and someone who won't let that turn into a "what have you done for me lately" kind of love. They should thank her for her undying support to everything UMass, and how much they appreciate the time she has invested here, both in and out of the office. Every athletic coach and team should continue to thank her for always remembering that tonight carries a whole new game.

We as students should all be so blessed to have a woman like this at our university, whether it's inside Bartlett or it's at the game. Maybe we could even go as far as emulating Alice, and making it to a few more games and letting out a few more cheers.

But this article isn't about putting more fans in the seats. This article is for you, Alice. May you continue to demonstrate to fans, like this writer, what real devotion means. Congratulations on an incredible 25 years, and we're all excited for many more.

and cohesive Dartmouth team led by senior defensive player Erin Osborn, the Minutewomen won't be able to afford costly turnovers and missed shots that haunted them against Boston College. Inconsistent play has been the story of Bolduc's squad so far, but for an upset to become reality today UMass will have to be clicking on all phases of the game.

"A lot of what we've been seeing is inconsistency as far as if one thing goes right something else doesn't, we're not having good even things on all levels, whether it's defense, attack or transition, there's always something we tend not to execute," Bolduc said. "I think this team is young however we expect a lot from our young players but at the same time they're learning. Some of it [inconsistency] is attributed to that [youth] possibly, I hate to say that's the reason why."

Most importantly the Minutewomen will have to slow the ball down on offense in order to limit the Big Green's time of possession and shut them down in the one on one aspect of defense.

"As far as Dartmouth is concerned they're a very good attacking team they have a great motion offense, they're very disciplined and they're very strong when they move the ball," Bolduc said. "They tend to get it rolling super fast and get their opponent on their feet, so our defensive unit has to be heads up, just constantly on their toes ready to anticipate. I think we're just going to go in and play our game, slow down their transition and hopefully play really good one vs. one defense, our defense has to be sharp tomorrow."

Lady Spartans stress teamwork

By Michael Marot
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — Michigan State will take its gang of five over a couple of blue—chip players any day.

After all, this season has proven the Spartans can win in unconventional ways, without All—Americans, without dominant inside players, even beating the nation's most established women's programs by rallying from seemingly impossible deficits.

At Michigan State, it's all about teamwork.

"You see teams with one or two All—Americans and that team loses," Kristin Haynie said. "That's what makes this team great. If someone has a bad game, someone else can step up."

Adhering to coach Joanne P.McCallie's deep—rooted philosophy is what has led the Spartans out of their mediocre past and onto the brink of their first national title. Michigan State (33—3) faces Baylor on Tuesday night in a matchup of first—time finalists.

As usual, the Spartans have reached the title game with a slightly different script.

While Baylor (32—3) relies primarily on its All—America tandem of Sophia Young and Steffanie Blackmon, Michigan State beats opponents with balance.

MATT DIETER/INDIANAPOLIS STAR

Michigan State's Liz Shimek, right, shoots over UT's Shyra Ely in the first half of their NCAA Women's final four tournament game.

Four starters average double figures although none scores more than 15 points per game. Two other players are scoring nearly eight points per game. It's Basketball 101 at East Lansing, Mich.

"We're not a bunch of all—stars," center Kelli Roehrig said. "But we have so many great players, I think we just complement each other so well."

McCallie seemingly has all the pieces in place.

Haynie is the fleet point guard and the school's career record—holder for steals (341). She was named most outstanding player of the Kansas City Region and the Big Ten tournament, and she averages 10.6 points and 6.8 rebounds.

Blackmon turned Bears around

By Chuck Schoffner
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — Steffanie Blackmon saw a challenge at Baylor and jumped at it. Kristin Haynie was told she could win championships at Michigan State and believed it.

Each took a chance at a struggling program with the goal of making a difference. Just look where they are now: On Tuesday night, one of them will leave the RCA Dome as part of a national championship team.

Baylor and Michigan State, Final Four rookies both, have put a fresh face on the title game, getting there after two astonishing comebacks in the semifinals.

No Connecticut, no Tennessee. Just two teams with eager, energetic coaches who arrived in their jobs at the same time — Kim Mulkey—Robertson at Baylor, Joanne P. McCallie with the Spartans — and could be a case study in how a five—year plan can work.

"A lot of brackets are busted and we just have to go out there and get it done," Baylor's Chelsea Whitaker said. "They're hungry and they have a nice young coach and our coach is young. They both just want to start something new at their university."

They already have.

Five years ago, Baylor was the worst team in the Big 12 and Michigan State was only slightly better in the Big Ten, a middle—of—the—pack program that was starting to go stale. Thanks to players such as Blackmon and Haynie, their fortunes have turned.

Baylor (32—3) goes into the final night with a 19—game-winning streak; Michigan State (33—3) has won 17 in a row. Baylor has the more celebrated players with Blackmon and Sophia Young, who helped the Lady Bears overcome a 15—point deficit to beat LSU in Sunday night's semifinals.

But no one in the NCAA tournament has played better as a team than Michigan State, which came from 16 down in the second half to beat Tennessee on Sunday, matching the biggest comeback in Final Four history.

"Ever since summer, we have been dreaming big — Final Fours, pursue championships in everything we do," Michigan State's Liz Shimek said. "It's not a surprise to us because we have worked so hard all year and over the course of the years. We know we belong here."

Another challenge

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

Once again the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3-5) will take on a much more experienced top 10 team today when it takes on the No. 6 Dartmouth Big Green (7-0) at 4 p.m. at Garber Field.

This is a big week for the Minutewomen; after taking on Dartmouth it will kick off the Atlantic 10 schedule when they face La Salle Friday and Saint Josephs on Sunday, both at home.

"It's a good chance to recover from Saturday and take care of some of the issues that we had in that game," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Kerri Connery has 16 goals this season for the Minutewomen and leads the team with eight assists. UMass takes on Dartmouth today.

"More maybe the mental issues, you know, turnovers at moments, possessions, finishing the ball and composure I think is one of our biggest issues."

For the most part UMass has started well against ranked opponents, most notably against then No. 10 Hofstra and No. 13 Syracuse in which the scores were tight at halftime.

Although turnovers and missed shots plagued the Maroon and White on Saturday, Bolduc is not concerned with her team's persistence to keep improving and fighting despite adversity such as Saturday's hard to swallow defeat.

"They've responded, I think our team is really resilient and they bounce back from adversity very well, I think they've never given up or thrown in the towel. I think for the most part whatever we tell them they usually change, we're hoping that they can continue those changes." Bolduc explained, "Unfortunat-ely we kind of had a lapse on Saturday. There were a little more turnovers than typical, for the first time we didn't finish the ball as well as we have, which killed us."

Minutemen look to end slide

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The season is still young and everyone is finally healthy. Now, the Massachusetts baseball team looks to turn around from a disappointing 3-13 start at its home opener when it hosts Holy Cross today at Earl Lorden Field.

The Minutemen, who are also 0-3 in Atlantic 10 action, have not played a game since March 27 and are currently on a seven-game losing skid. UMass returns their veteran outfield of seniors Jason Twomley and Curt Szado and junior Derrick Durepo after each player had spent time on the injured list this season.

"Any time is a good time to turn things around, but especially since we haven't played for a week and a half," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We got all our guys back from injury and finally have the line-up we hoped to have at the beginning of the season. So, we are obviously looking to play better."

UMass is looking to bounce back after Xavier exploded for 18 runs, in an 18-3 victory over the Minutemenover over a week ago.The Crusaders have also not played a game in a considerable amount of time. In their last game, the Purple and White spilt a double header against Northeastern on March 26.

The Maroon and White own a 35-26-1 record all-time versus Holy Cross. Since 1997, the Minutemen have won eight-straight meetings, as the inagural meeting dating back to 1894. This year's meeting was originally scheduled to be played in Worcester. Due to poor field conditions, however, the game was moved to Amherst.

For second year in a row Holy Cross will face UMass in its home opener. Last season, the Minutemen took an 8-5 victory with the help of Szado, who hit a game-clinching three-run homer in the bottom of the eighth.

Holy Cross is 4-9, but has a lot of depth in the batting order. The Crusaders, who are yet to play at home, have five players with over 40 at-bats hitting over .275. Senior Tim Potvin is hiting .386 with two triples and 22 hits. Though, the Worcester native tends to strike out a lot with 16 strikeouts so far this season.

On the mound for the Purple and White will be Mike Miller, the only pitcher with an earn run average under five on the staff. Miller is posting a 4.12 ERA after 24 innings work with a 2-1 record and 22 strikeouts going into tomorrow's game.

"Our biggest concern is our ball club," Stone said. "We feel if we play well, we have a good chance to win. So, we are not concerned about what [Holy Cross] is doing, because we feel we have beaten ourselves in some games. [The focus] is to play well and execute."

The trio of outfielders' return will help the lack of offensive production over the last seven games. Without their veteran hitters, UMass has been outscored 44-9 over their seven game skid.

If the Minutemen can manufacture runs, they will have junior hurler Matt Torra on the mound to protect their lead. Torra has been hot this season, posting a 1-2 record with a 1.25 earn run average. He also has 44 strikeouts and only seven walks to go along with a .198 opponent batting average against him. However, Torra is expected to only pitch the first two innings today.

"We are going to spilt up the time, because we haven't played and we need to get some guys some work," Stone explained.

UMass recently had a three-game series against La Salle at Earl Lorden Field postponed this past weekend due to poor field conditions. The weather has not damage UMass' home field only once, as the original home opener was scheduled for March 29 against Sacred Heart, as it was also postponed due to poor field conditions.

"Hopefully, there is not too much rust," Stone said. "We have been doing a lot of things, such as simulating games. I think the guys are pretty hungry right now to play and we should be ready to go."

Bourque leaves BU

BOSTON (AP) — The son of Bruins legend Ray Bourque is leaving Boston University after one season to play junior hockey in Canada.

Chris Bourque, 19, is expected to play for the Moncton Wildcats of the Quebec Major Junior League, the team said Tuesday.

BU spokesman Pete Charbonneau confirmed Monday that Bourque was leaving the school, but referred further questions to coach Jack Parker, who did not immediately return calls on Monday.

Bourque was named to the Hockey East all-rookie team after recording 10 goals and 13 assists in 35 games. He was MVP of the Beanpot tournament after scoring the game-winning goal in overtime against Northeastern in the title game.

The 5-foot-8, 175-pound forward was a second-round pick of the Washington Capitals in the 2004 NHL draft.

Bourque's agent, Steve Kasper, was meeting with Moncton director of hockey operations Allan Power on Monday in Montreal, team spokesman Greg Turner said.

Ray Bourque, a native of Quebec, also played in the QMJL before he was drafted by the Bruins. He was a five-time Norris Trophy winner as the NHL's best defenseman and spent 20-plus seasons in Boston before capping his career by winning the Stanley Cup with Colorado in 2001.

Tribute to a true fan

You'd be hard pressed to go to any University of Massachusetts home game without noticing her. Of course, while you might not see her, you'll definitely hear her.

Zach Oelschlegel

Armed with a small megaphone, wearing anything from a Jacksonville Jaguars jacket to a UMass hockey jersey, and blessed with a pair of lungs sure to make any opera singer jealous, she lets out a cheer easily audible inside the boisterous Mullins Center, or anywhere within 400 yards of Garber Field.

"Go, go, go, go, go, goooo!"

Or, "Here we go U-Mass, here we go!"

"Go Mass, go! Go Mass, go!"

You won't miss the entrance this woman puts on.

Her name is Alice Bishko, Secretary for the Comparative Literature and Film Studies departments by day, and without question, the loudest and most dedicated fan here at UMass. Period.

"I'm not so good with the rules, I just cheer 'em on," she explains.

And cheer she does. Alice can be found whooping for just about every UMass squad, whether that's men's football and lacrosse, or women's soccer, or baseball and softball, or women's club hockey. The men's hockey team has even gone as far as giving her a few jerseys to wear to the games, with "Bishko" stitched across the shoulders.

Don't even try asking which team is her favorite, either.

"I couldn't do that!" she exclaims, almost seeming offended by such a question. You get the feeling it's like asking a mother which one of her children is her favorite.

She's even gone as far as making birthday cakes for team members. One gets a sense of how much these teams mean to her considering she's lived in the UMass area her entire life.

Born in Northampton, she grew up on a farm, and "used to call the cows home." That probably explains those powerful pipes. She's quick to tell you that she doesn't drink or smoke, either. When you're in the business of cheering, you

Coaching legends inducted to HOF

By R.B. Fallstrom
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Last month, Jim Boeheim and Jim Calhoun became the first college basketball coaches with 700 wins to face each other. On Monday, they shared the stage again, proudly holding jerseys signifying their election to the Basketball Hall of Fame.

"This is, beyond my wife and children, the most special day in my life," Calhoun said. "When I was told the news, it was surreal."

Coach and broadcaster Hubie Brown. Brazilian women's star Hortencia Marcari and LSU coach Sue Gunter also were voted into the Hall. The new members will be enshrined Sept. 8—10 in Springfield, Mass.

The headliners, though, were a pair of Big East Conference coaches who have seemingly been in lockstep. Boeheim won his first NCAA title in 2003, and Calhoun won his second the next year. The coaches are tied for sixth on the career active victory list. Boeheim entering his 30th season next year at 703—241 and Calhoun heading into his 34th at 703—310.

Both also remain at the top of their game. Boeheim has twin 5—year—old daughters and he said he wanted to coach until they were "a lot older."

"Ideally, you'd like to be done coaching when you get to the Hall of Fame," Boeheim said. "It would be nice to say 'This is it.' The reality is, we open with Cornell next year."

Last year, college coaches were shut out in the balloting. This year, the seven former NBA players among the list of 16 finalists — Joe Dumars, Dennis Johnson, Adrian Dantley, Dominique Wilkins, Bernard King, Maurice Cheeks and Chet Walker — ended up on the outside.

"This class represents how difficult it is to get enshrined," said Russ Granik, deputy commissioner of the NBA. "Our Hall is probably unique in sports in that it represents all the levels of the game."

Boeheim said neither he nor Calhoun would have made it were it not for the rise in the 1980s of the Big East. He said Dave Gavitt, the conference's first commissioner, deserves much of the credit.

"The bottom line is if it weren't for Dave Gavitt, none of us would be in the Hall of Fame," Boeheim said. "He had a vision to put this thing together. We went from a nice little regional program to the national scene in one year."

Brown was elected under the category of contributor for his impact on the game as a coach, clinician, broadcaster and ambassador.

He retired as coach of the Memphis Grizzlies this season after being voted the NBA's coach of the year in 2004. He won the same award in 1978 with Atlanta. He won an American Basketball Association title with the Kentucky Colonels in 1975 and eight former assistants have gone on to become NBA head coaches. He also has hosted hundreds of clinics worldwide.

"I don't think you ever wake up when you're doing a job thinking of being in the Hall of Fame," Brown said. "It's a great time for my family and myself and I'd like to thank all of the people that rewarded us."

Gunter ranks third among women's basketball coaches with 708 victories. Her LSU squad went to the Final Four in her last season before she stepped down as coach in 2004 while battling emphysema, an illness that prevented her from attending the ceremony. She was to coach the U.S. women's team at the 1980 Olympics, but the United States boycotted the games.

Hortencia, known by her first name like many Brazilian athletes, averaged 27.6 points while leading Brazil to the 1994 women's world championship. She also helped her country win the silver medal in the 1996 Olympics.

Also at the ceremony, Raymond Felton of NCAA finalist North Carolina was named the Bob Cousy Collegiate Point Guard winner.

Minutewomen suffer A-10 losses

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team dropped both games of a doubleheader at Fordham yesterday. The Minutewomen fell 4-2 in the opener and lost 14-6 in the nightcap.

UMass (11-11-1, 2-2 A-10) waited two days to take on the Rams, as games on both Saturday and Sunday were canceled due to rain. The extra time off clearly didn't help the Minutewomen, as they lost to the streaking Rams for the first time ever. UMass had won all 23 games against Fordham previously.

Fordham has now won eight games in a row.

The Minutewomen will look to get back on the winning track when they return home to take on Maine in a doubleheader on Wednesday beginning at 2 p.m.

Fordham (16-10, 6-0 Atlantic 10) took a 1-0 lead on a sacrifice fly in the fourth inning of the first game. The Rams held the lead until the sixth inning when Pam Sulick stroked a two-out, two-run single to give UMass a 2-1 edge.

That appeared to be all the offense UMass pitcher Barb LaFogg would need. LaFogg, who was named A-10 Pitcher of the Week on Monday for the second time this season, was shutting down the Fordham lineup through the first five innings, allowing only two hits.

LaFogg retired the first two batters she faced in the bottom of the sixth, but a walk and a hit batter put two runners on for Fordham's Lisa Busciascio. Busciascio then took LaFogg deep to left center giving Fordham a 4-2 lead it would not relinquish.

LaFogg (8-7) took the loss, despite allowing only three hits.

UMass catcher KJ Kelley has four home runs on the season. Kelley and the Minutewomen were swept by A-10 rival Fordham yesterday.

LaFogg was out-dueled by Sara Kinney (11-5) who went the distance allowing only two runs on four hits.

UMass looked as if it would rebound in the second game, as it took a 1-0 lead in the top of the first. With runners on first and third, UMass' Candice Molinari attempted to steal second. The throw by Fordham's catcher sailed into centerfield allowing Hilary Puglia to score from third.

The lead was short-lived, as the Rams quickly put six runs on the board in their half of the inning. A pair of two-run doubles accounted for four of the runs in the outburst.

The Minutewomen battled back in the second, cutting the lead to 6-4. UMass scratched out three runs with two outs without ever getting the ball out of the infield. Sulick began the rally with an infield single. Kristi Stefanoni followed with a walk and Puglia was hit by a pitch loading the bases for Molinari. Molinari then delivered with a triple to right field, clearing the bases.

Fordham opened the lead to 8-4 in the third on a bases loaded single by Laura Klaiber, who drove in five runs in the second game. Once again UMass rallied, as Denise Denis drove in two runs with a single in the fourth, bringing UMass to within two, at 8-6.

UMass pitcher Jenna Busa (3-4) was unable to contain Fordham's offense, though, and the Rams broke the game open. Fordham scored two unearned runs in the fourth and then tacked on another run on a solo home run by Allison Twarowski in the fifth.

Klaiber picked up two more RBI in the sixth, as Fordham scored three runs, resulting in a mercy-rule win.

APD hires officers for Road Respect campaign

By Brendan Heck
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Police Department has received a $12,000 grant from the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau as part of a statewide campaign to crackdown on aggressive driving through enhanced enforcement; UMass drivers however, do not support the campaign.

Amherst Police Chief Charles Scherpa announced in a press release that the Amherst Police department will be conducting what the press released referred to as a, "traffic enforcement mobilization," which has been titled "Road Respect."

The Road Respect campaign will use the $12,000 to activate 20 extra police officers to work shifts covering only traffic violations. "The police officers covering the traffic violations will be targeting speeding, illegal rights on red, following too close to another vehicle, and other types of aggressive driving," said Lieutenant Jennifer Gunderson, the Amherst Police Department's spokeswoman for Road Respect.

Upon hearing of the Road Respect campaign, students with vehicles at UMass, for the most part, expressed negative feelings about the increased enforcement.

Students generally agreed that the program was a waste of money and unnecessary in Amherst.

"I think [the Amherst Police] should worry about making traffic less congested in Amherst. Traffic is always so clogged up in Amherst, that is probably why people drive aggressive in the first place," said Jessica Plassmann, a junior Classics Major.

The Governor's Safety Bureau Web site states that the goal of the Road Respect campaign is to, "reduce aggressive driving through education and enforcement of the traffic laws."

When Gunderson was asked about the education aspect of the campaign, she replied, "It is education through enforcement. Usually when a person is stopped by an officer it makes them aware of their driving habits."

UMass students did not agree with Gunderson. Many students were quick to offer anecdotes of, in their opinions, poor reasons for being pulled over. "Every time I have been stopped in Amherst, It has been for silly reasons. I was once pulled over twice in ten minutes for my taillight being out" said Randi Craft, a senior Psychology major.

"Being pulled over for something minor will not change the way I drive," said Laura Bartlett, a senior English Major.

Gunderson feels that the extra numbers of police officers enforcing traffic violations will deter drivers from com-

Best selling author to come to UMass tonight

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

New York Times best selling author Tammy Bruce will be presenting a lecture tonight at 7 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. "How Conservative Politics Empower Women, Gays and Other Minorities" Is a free event open to the public. She believes conservative ideas help empower women and minorities.

Sponsored by the University of Massachusettes Republican Club and the Young America Foundation, the speech features Bruce, a progressive feminist who identifies as pro-choice, gun-owning, pro-death penalty and is openly gay.

An author of two books, she graduated from the University of Southern California with a degree in political science. Her first work, "The New Thought Police," published in October 2001 looks at freedom of expression and its importance as well as the culture wars. She also states liberty is under attack by a rise in Left-wing McCarthyism. "The Death of Right and Wrong: Exposing the Left's Assault on Our Culture and Values" deals with moral relativism in society and is a bestseller.

According to her website, www.tammybruce.com, she became interested in feminist activism in the late 1980s to "contribute to the ongoing effort to ensure safe and legal abortion for all women." Bruce later joined the National Organization for Women, or NOW and was elected president when she was 27 in the Los Angeles chapter.

The youngest woman to get this position, the L.A. chapter's membership doubled from 2,000 to 4,000 in a year under her lead. Bruce served from 1990 to 1996 with NOW as president, gathering activists within the area as well as nationally over many issues, such as women's image in the media, child care, health care, economics, violence against women, and domestic violence. This was the longest one has served in this NOW chapter in 30 years. Also in NOW, Bruce was a member for two years on their national board of directors.

Bruce is the first woman in the coun-

Hampshire hires president

AMHERST (AP) — A dean from the University of California at Berkeley was named president of Hampshire College on Tuesday.

Ralph J. Hexter succeeds Gregory Prince Jr. to become the fifth president of the small liberal arts college.

"Hampshire College has a unique place among our nation's colleges and I am honored to join the community as its president," Hexter said.

Hexter, 52, said fundraising would be among his most immediate tasks.

The school, which has about 1,300 students, has a $30 million endowment.

Hexter, executive dean of Berkeley's liberal arts college and university dean of arts and sciences, has been a professor of classics and comparative literature there since 1996, specializing in Greek and Latin texts.

He has also taught at the University of Colorado and Yale.

Prince announced he would retire last year after 16 years as Hampshire's president.

Social activist discusses human rights and promotes her new book

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Loretta J. Ross, a social activist for human rights, regaled students and community members Monday night at the Campus Center with stories of her involvement in activism and promoted her book about sexual rights.

Ross began her speech with anecdotes of the events that caused her to become an activist.

Ross grew up in a conservative, military family and only experienced her first taste of the feminist movement that would grow to be a big part of her life, when she became pregnant in high school.

Girls who became pregnant in those days, explained Ross, were usually expelled from school. Ross's family, however, fought this decision and won.

However, Ross admitted that she was not hooked into feminism yet.

Years later, in college, Ross became pregnant a second time and aborted the child.

To prevent further pregnancy, Ross said she was prescribed the Dalkon Shield from A.H. Robins.

The shield, however, caused Ross to become sterile and, after finding out that she was only one of many that this happened to, Ross sued A.H. Robins and won.

At this point though, even after Ross had won her lawsuit, she realized that the Dalkon Shield was still being sold to women in South Africa who "had no one who was going to fight for them."

This led Ross to realize that women needed activists to fight for them, for their reproductive right to have children or to choose not to.

Ross went on to work in rape crisis saying, "I got involved because I

Vatican responding in non-traditional ways

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Responding to Pope John Paul II's request, the Vatican will depart from centuries-old tradition by ringing bells in addition to sending up white smoke to signal the election of his successor.

Before he died Saturday at age 84, John Paul also made his wish known "to be buried in the ground" and not placed in an above-ground tomb. Archbishop Piero Marini said Tuesday. He will buried in the tomb left vacant after the remains of Pope John XXIII were exhumed from the cramped grotto under St. Peter's Basilica in 2001 and moved to the main floor following his beatification.

John Paul will be laid to rest with a white silk veil on his face, a rosary in his hands and his body clad in liturgical vestments and the white miter.

Following the centuries-old custom for burying popes, his body will be placed inside three coffins — wood, zinc and wood — a design meant to slow decomposition, the Vatican confirmed.

A small bag of commemorative medals issued over the course of his 26-year pontificate, as well as a sealed document featuring a brief description in Latin of John Paul's life, will be buried with him near the tomb that is traditionally believed to be that of the first pope, St. Peter.

John Paul's personal physician told La Repubblica newspaper that the Polish-born pope "passed away slowly, with pain and suffering which he endured with great human dignity."

"The Holy Father could not utter a single word before passing away," said Dr. Renato Buzzonetti. "Just as happened in the last days he could not speak, he was forced to silence."

Marini brushed off rumors that Polish soil would be placed in the coffin, as many Poles had hoped.

"Everybody has wishes. It is impossible to fulfill them all," he said.

One of John Paul's wishes, Marini said, was for bells to ring in the announcement of a new pope to avoid confusion over the color of the smoke coming from the chimney of the Sistine Chapel.

Black smoke signals no decision has been made after a papal ballot, while white smoke means a pope has been elected. The smoke is from the burning of the secret paper ballots, and chemicals are added to heighten the color.

"This time we plan to ring the bells to make the election of the pope clearer," he said, recalling wrong calls in past elections. "This way even journalists will know," an acknowledgment of the Vatican's interest in using the media to get its message across to a worldwide audience.

At least 1 million people have flocked to St. Peter's Square.

An estimated 600,000 mourners streamed past John Paul's crimson-robed body in St. Peter's Basilica during the first 24 hours of viewing, city authorities said. Millions are expected in Rome for Friday's 10 a.m. funeral (4 a.m. EDT), including an estimated 2 million Poles hoping to pay last respects to their native son.

Italy called extra police to Rome and planned to seal off much of the Eternal City to protect a VIP contingent that will include President Bush, former presidents Bush and Clinton as well as the presidents of Judge will not lift gag order

By Ken MaGuire
Associated Press

BOSTON — A judge refused to immediately lift a gag order Tuesday against a reporter for The Standard-Times of New Bedford that prevents the newspaper from publishing what it learned about a drug case during a hearing that was meant to be closed to the public.

Instead, U.S. District Judge Robert E. Keeton said he would allow the order to remain in place until Wednesday, to give lawyers a chance to appeal. The newspaper has called the gag order a violation of its First Amendment rights.

The gag order was issued after Ray Henry, a reporter for the newspaper, attended a hearing last week in a drug case. During the hearing, which was supposed to be closed, the judge realized a reporter was in the courtroom and ordered Henry to neither report nor discuss what he heard.

"Every minute that Mr. Henry remains under this order is an infringement on his First Amendment rights," Standard Times attorney Howard Merten told Keeton during a hearing where the paper urged him to lift the order. "He heard things in a court that he has a fundamental and unlimited right to report."

But Keeton said he'll let the Appeals Court decide, on the expectation that prosecutors would appeal the expiration of the gag order.

"This is designed to give everymitting these violations. "Their presence alone makes people more aware of how they are driving."

Students agreed with Gunderson on this point. "Now that I know [Road Respect has begun in Amherst], I am a little concerned about driving in Amherst because I am from New Jersey and it seems like they [police officers] are tougher on out-of-staters," said Mike Maloney, a senior Finance Major.

Students also agreed with the Governor's Safety Bureau's Web site, which said that speeding is a local problem. The Web site states, "The speeding fatality rate for local roads is almost three times that of the interstate highways."

"Twenty extra cops is a bit excessive for traffic violations, but I think it's a good idea to crack down at specific times such as Friday nights when kids are coming home from the bar," said Maloney.

"They could put that money towards fixing the roads around here. I think that would make me feel safer as a driver," said Lauren Doyle, a senior Sociologist Major.

The Road Respect campaign began last Monday, and will run through Sunday, April 17.

pen to anyone else."

Eventually, Ross's work led her to get a job at the Center for Democratic Renewal where she helped monitor hate groups. "I brought a feminist lens into the group," said Ross, "too few women were monitoring the far right professionally."

One of her biggest challenges on the job, said Ross, was working to help reform former hate group members. "The last thing I thought I'd be doing was hanging out with neo-Nazis," said Ross.

Her work, however, brought Ross further into activism.

"I learned that civil rights and sexual rights were just a part of what I should be fighting for. I should be fighting for human rights."

Human rights, according to Ross, include civil, political, economic, social, cultural, environmental, developmental and sexual rights.

Still, Ross said that her biggest focus remained in the feminist movement.

Her knowledge and work in the field led Ross to be contacted to help write a book, "Undivided Rights- Women of Color Organize for Reproductive Justice."

"Undivided rights," said Ross, "it was the perfect title.

Undivided rights are what women of color are demanding. They want all aspects of human rights.

They want undivided rights because they are undivided humans."

The biggest thing that Ross and her co-authors, Jael Silliman, Marlene Garber Fried and Elena R. Gutierres, wanted to avoid was telling a story about what white people had done to black women in the reproductive rights fight. "We wanted to make this a story about what black women did for themselves."

"We wanted to name the unnamed so that people could see things that had not yet been captured by history books."

Ross and her co-authors interviewed many different ethnic women's groups.

"We realized," said Ross, "that we were writing these groups first histories. This was the first time a lot of this information was put into print."

Ross hopes that the book will help unite women of color and reveal connections to them so that they can unite and help each other.

"More attention and funding goes to groups made up mostly of white women. They can't know what is best for the communities of colored women."

One thing that Ross feels connects all women, colored and white is the fact that "attempts to control women's bodies this way are connected to attempts to control our issues."

Ross's speech was the final event in a series called "Recognize This!

I am a woman of color ... and so much more," put on by Alana Health Outreach, the Educator Advocate program of the EveryWoman's Center, the Office of ALANA Affairs and the Woman of Color Leadership Network.

Vatican officials set to break traditions

Syria and Iran.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the cardinals had yet to decide on a date for their conclave to choose a new pope. According to church law, it must start 15 to 20 days after a pope dies.

The next pope is likely to follow John Paul's conservative bent closely — the late pontiff appointed all but three of the 117 cardinals who can vote in a conclave.

Brazilian Cardinal Geraldo Majella Agnelo told Italian state radio Tuesday that he thought a new pope would be chosen quickly.

"I don't think it will be a long conclave," he said, adding that cardinals have had time to reflect beforehand and already should have "clear ideas" when they begin the balloting.

As the cardinals met, buses unloaded huge groups of students, pilgrims and clergy who joined a line stretching for miles along the wide avenue leading to St. Peter's Square and through the streets of the neighborhood around the Vatican.

Philadelphia Cardinal Justin Rigali, who spent years working at the Vatican, called the outpouring the most dramatic he has witnessed.

"This is the fourth funeral for a pope that I personally participated in. I think this exceeds everything," he said. "This is the most extraordinary thing that ever happened."

The doors of St. Peter's Basilica were opened to the public Monday evening. At 3 a.m. Tuesday, the doors were closed for cleaning and the faithful outside started chanting "Open up, open up!" in protest.

Margherita Saccomani, who came to Rome from Tuscany, huddled under a foil blanket with her three children. "I hope it's not curiosity but deep faith that brings people here," she said. "I am here because I want my daughters to experience this."

The cardinals — who are sworn to secrecy on their deliberations — are to review any papers the pope may have left for them.

One may reveal the name of a cardinal John Paul said he named in 2003 but never publicly identified. The name of the cardinal was held "in pectore," or "in the heart" — a formula that has been used when a pope wants to appoint a cardinal in a country where the church is oppressed.

Navarro-Valls said Tuesday he didn't know if the pope mentioned the "in pectore" cardinal in any documents given to the cardinals.

Thousands of people gather in the streets of Rome to catch a glimpse of the Pope's body. His funeral will be on Friday.

Bush using Patriot Act for monitoring

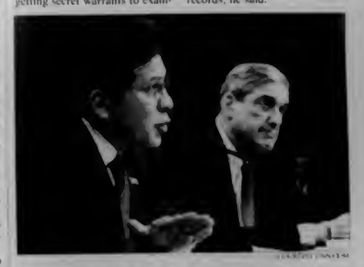
By Mark Sherman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has used the Patriot Act's powers to listen to cell phone conversations and examine business records 84 times in 3 1/2 years, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday as Congress began considering whether to renew those powers and other sections of the anti-terror law.

Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller urged lawmakers to make permanent all 15 expiring provisions of the law, some of which have aroused civil liberties concerns. Mueller also asked lawmakers to expand the bureau's ability to obtain records in terrorism cases without first asking a judge or grand jury.

"Al-Qaida and other groups remain a grave threat to our country, and now is not the time for us to relinquish our tools in that fight," Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Several lawmakers are introducing legislation Wednesday to curb major parts of the Patriot Act. Their bill would limit so-called "roving wiretaps" that allow authorities to monitor a suspect's cell phones and would raise the standard of proof the government has to meet before getting secret warrants to examine business records.



An unusual coalition of groups, including the American Conservative Union and the liberal-leaning American Civil Liberties Union, is backing the new legislation.

Though the Patriot Act prompts strong reactions, the hearing was remarkably subdued, with senators praising Gonzales for his willingness to engage in debate. "That's a grand departure from your predecessor," said Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., referring to former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Gonzales told lawmakers the provisions have been invoked sparingly since the Patriot Act became law in October 2001, just 45 days after the Sept. 11 attacks, expanding the government's surveillance and prosecutorial powers against suspected terrorists, their associates and financiers.

Authorities have sought roving wiretaps 49 times and business records 35 times, Gonzales said. All the business-record warrants were issued since September 2003.

The government has never used the provision permitting secret warrants for "books, records, papers, documents and other items" to obtain library, bookstore, medical or gun sale records, he said.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, right, and FBI Director Robert Mueller testify Tuesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Four U.S. troops killed in Iraqi bombing

By Antonio Castaneda
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Four U.S. troops were killed in clashes and bombings across Iraq, the U.S. military said Tuesday, and videos posted on the Internet showed militants purportedly beheading an Iraqi soldier and killing a reported informer.

A joint U.S.-Iraqi attack on dozens of insurgents in eastern Diyala province on Monday left two American soldiers and one Iraqi soldier dead, U.S. military spokesman said. Two U.S. soldiers were also wounded in the attack, which continued into Tuesday.

In Baghdad's southern Dora neighborhood, an abandoned taxi exploded on an expressway near a U.S. patrol on Tuesday, killing another U.S. soldier and wounding four others, said Sgt. 1st Class David Abrams, a spokesman for Task Force Baghdad.

Another explosion targeted a joint Iraqi-U.S. convoy in Baghdad's Amiriyah neighborhood, said al-Amil police captain Talib Thamir. Abrams said a blast occurred but he did not have any details.

A U.S. Marine was also killed Monday by an explosion in the sprawling, western province of Anbar.

At least 1,537 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Gunmen broke into a house and kidnapped a top Interior Ministry official, Brig. Gen. Ialal Mohammed Saleh, U.S. and Iraqi officials said.

Saleh is involved in anti-insurgency operations in Iraq, but it was unclear why he was abducted. Kidnappings are common, with some abductors seeking ransoms and others making political demands.

Babil police spokesman Capt. Muthana Khalid said 10 headless bodies were found by Iraqi police 30 miles south of Baghdad, but he didn't give any details on exactly where or how the bodies were located. Seven of the victims were identified as Iraqi soldiers, and three others were police, according to Khalid and an Interior Ministry official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

There have been several reports of the discovery of headless corpses, usually believed to be Iraqi security forces, but none have been independently confirmed.

In a purported video posted Tuesday from Al-Qaida in Iraq, a text shown in the images identified the Iraqi soldier as Iassim Mohammed Hussein Mahdi, who appeared to be in his early 20s. The video also showed the black banner of the group, which is headed by wanted Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The video, posted on a militant Web site that carries most al-Qaida in Iraq statements, could not be immediately authenticated. It showed an unidentified interrogator talking to the man, who said he had received orders from his superiors "to kill the mujahedeen anywhere and without hesitation."

The man was shown squatting on the ground in an empty room, wearing full military gear with his hands tied behind his back. He said he was a member of the Iraqi National Guard's 4th Brigade, but did not say when or where he had been captured by militants.

Mahdi said he "regretted" working with the U.S.-allied Iraqi government and urged "all members of the police, National Guard and army to abandon this work, which is religiously prohibited."

"God's verdict against this renegade, who was tempted by dollars, has been carried out," said a statement shown on the video.

The video later showed Mahdi lying blindfolded on the ground before two masked men appeared. One held Mahdi's legs while the other severed his head with a knife with shouts of "God is great!" heard from the background.

Al-Qaida in Iraq has claimed responsibility for beheading Western hostages and many members of the Iraqi security forces.

A second video posted on the same Web site by another group, Ansar al-Sunnah Army, showed a man who confessed to a militant interrogating him that he worked as an informer to the police in the northern city of Mosul. The militant was speaking in the distinct Mosul accent of Iraqi Arabic.

The man, who identified himself as Hussein Taha Qassim and said he was born in 1968, told the interrogator that he informed the police about the hideouts of four "mujahedeen." He said the police killed three of them and the fourth escaped.

Qassim was shown lying face-down on the ground, and a masked gunman shot him with a volley of bullets from an automatic weapon. The video's authenticity could not be verified.

In a day of stepped-up attacks, insurgents also targeted government and religious officials.

body a right to be heard ... instead of the right of one party to be heard," the judge said. "I should take the law from the court of appeals, not counsel."

The hearing last Thursday was in the marijuana distribution and money laundering case against Arlindo Dossantos Jr., 35, of North Dartmouth. He was charged in 2001 for allegedly running a drug ring in New Bedford and Rhode Island.

Federal prosecutor William F. Bloomer said if the information discussed at the hearing became public it could put people in danger, and could jeopardize ongoing investigations. Witnesses could be intimidated and evidence destroyed, he said.

"There is a very serious risk of harm to individuals and families if a newspaper irresponsibly prints information heard at that March 31st hearing," said Bloomer, who declined to say after the hearing if he would appeal.

Christina Sterling, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, would not comment on an appeal.

Standard-Times Managing Editor Dan Rosenfeld said readers should be informed about drug cases in their communities.

"We have a responsibility to report what's going on with regard to law enforcement and public corruption to the people of Bristol County," he said outside the courtroom. "This isn't national security. This isn't the Pentagon Papers."

New pope must bring Catholics into new era

Catholics and non-Catholics have felt the death of Pope John Paul II around the world. He was a man who received respect, admiration and love from all corners of the globe. Some argued that he was too conservative in his ideology, and was holding the Catholic Church back from entering the modern era, but even his staunchest opponents had to admire his way of dealing with people and his love for humanity.

It has been days since the pope's passing, and it will be several more days until his successor is named. While admiration and remembrance are important, as equally important is the voting process currently being undertaken by the College of Cardinals in the Vatican. Some say the voting process will be quick, as John Paul II's extended illness has given most of the cardinals ample time to decide on who they think the next pontiff should be.

John Paul II left his successor with very big shoes to fill, although the next pope can never be expected to live up to his predecessor. Some even think that getting away from John Paul II's way of thinking is the key to the next papacy. Will the next pope finally break the Church's stance on allowing priests to marry? Will he allow women to join the priesthood? Will he come down harder on priests charged in sexual abuse cases?

These are all questions that the newly elected pontiff will have to address. The Church has been criticized for not joining the rest of the world in the 21st century, and the newly elected pope will have the opportunity to do just that. That is not to say that he will completely break with the ways of John Paul II, but rather find a way to modernize the Catholic Church in a way that is best fitting for it as a worldwide institution. After all, if there was one thing John Paul II was good at, it was finding compromise and breaking down partisan walls.

With this said, the potential successors to John Paul II is a list that is both extensive and impressive. There are realistically over a dozen men who are papable, ranging from Africans, Europeans, Asians and Latin Americans. The election of many of the candidates would, in some way, show that the Catholic Church is moving forward.

The election of Nigerian-born Francis Arinze, for example, would show that the Church is expanding beyond Europe into the southern hemisphere, which happens to be one of the fastest growing areas of the Catholic Church. The possible election of the first "black pope" has also drawn a great deal of media attention, and would certainly put Arinze in the media spotlight from the start.

There is also Jorge Mario Bergoglio, from Argentina. He trained as a chemist before becoming the archbishop of Buenos Aires. A highly trained and studied man, Bergoglio would be an interesting, if not controversial choice as successor, given his Jesuit background.

One thing is almost a 100 percent guaranteed: the next pope will not be American. While the United States may be, to some, the "land of opportunity," most people across the globe, especially in Third World countries, disagree with our foreign policy and view us as a distant world superpower.

In the very near future, we will know who the next pope will be. Whoever is chosen, the Catholic Church must make sure they elect someone who can direct the Church into the modern world, while not sacrificing the essence of its teachings. Trying to replace John Paul II is impossible, but finding a man who can continue his legacy, while striving to progress the Church further in new directions, is not.

Genocide can't go unnoticed

Andrew Freeman

On Nov. 23, 2004 at 6 a.m., forces loyal to the Sudanese government attacked the village of Adwa in South Darfur, according to a report by the U.N. International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur. The town was looted, and many of its inhabitants fled to the mountains. Men who were captured were summarily executed, as was anyone who attempted to escape, while young girls were taken away to be raped. Over 100 individuals were injured, and between 20 and 30 were killed. Such horrific scenes are all too common in the Darfur region of Sudan, where a genocide, or systematic slaughter of a particular group, has been occurring for the last two years.

Sudan has been involved in domestic warfare for decades, but this conflict arose recently, when rebels from Darfur attacked military installations in 2003, hoping to gain greater regional autonomy. The Arab government in Khartoum, faced with a sectional rebellion in the primarily non-Arab African Darfur, began assaulting and displacing much of the population there.

Many attacks begin with the Sudanese government's helicopters or aircraft, striking a village in Darfur, followed by government soldiers and militia on horseback, called Janjaweed, moving in, slaughtering the men and raping the women. An estimated 250,000 people have already been killed, 1.6 million have been made homeless and 200,000 have fled to Chad, according to the Save Darfur Coalition.

The U.N. investigation noted hundreds of instances of "massacres, summary executions, rape and other forms of sexual violence, torture, abduction, looting of property and livestock, as well as deliberate destruction and torching of villages."

This violence was targeted at certain black African tribes, primarily the Masaulit, Zaghawa and Fur. Victims reported the aggressors made such statements as "we are here to eradicate blacks" and "the Fur are slaves, we will kill them."

Neither our government nor our people are doing enough about this.

Although the Bush administration has declared Sudan is committing genocide, its response, ironically, is to turn to the United Nations to handle the problem. Moreover, the American people are tuned out. We loudly mourn Terri Schiavo, or the Pope, while ordinary Sudanese are dying in droves, unheard.

I can go into the legal definitions of genocide, how a finding of it necessitates international response by signatories of the Genocide Convention, and so on, but that is not enough, and hasn't been for decades. The American people, and the world at large, have not done enough to stop needless slaughter, not in Rwanda, nor Iraq, Cambodia, or Bosnia. The only genocide we stopped towards its outset was in Kosovo, and that was the third genocide to occur during the Clinton administration. Platitudes about international law have not been enough — there must be genuine outrage.

We Americans need to take a moral stand against genocide, wherever it occurs, and let that guide our foreign policy in dealing with genocidal regimes. If we are seen as true liberators, saving beleaguered peoples from destruction, that will improve our image worldwide, in addition to saving lives and promoting regional stability.

In Sudan, our government could provide far more logistical and financial support to the small African Union force there. We had spent only $45 million, compared to the European Union's $100 million, according to Refugees International. A no fly zone enforced over the skies of Darfur by our Air Force would prevent Sudanese helicopters and jets from striking at villages. Our government could also push for a broadening of the mandate for the African Union troops already there, so they could respond more aggressively to the Janjaweed attackers.

There are many ways that individuals can help out as well. These range from participating in petition campaigns, to contributing to humanitarian aid organizations like Doctors Without Borders, CARE or Christian Aid that are working in Darfur, to distributing flyers on campus. If enough Americans take action to publicize and denounce the atrocities occurring in Darfur, then there is a chance to stop them.

Vengeance is the new justice

Amelia Sabadini

"That's her. She did it." A skinny dark-haired girl I've never seen before points me at.

"This one." Two women pull me out of the line up. I do not even know what it is that I'm supposed to have done, but I know I'm in trouble, and so I start to shake. This is taken as a veritable confession. "Look what you did to her!" One of the women shouts at me as she drags me in front of the girl who's considerably taller than I am. I have to look up as the girl opens her collar to reveal a red scratch starting at the base of her neck and scoring down her sternum.

"I didn't do it." It only makes things worse. There's a considerable amount of shouting, shaking and wretched rhetorical questions. Then the "fair" thing to do is decided upon and even explained to me beforehand as such: the strange, tall, skinny girl steps forward and rakes her fingernails down my neck. I was four when this happened. It was one of my first lessons in what's considered fair and just in our society.

The kindergarten class where this took place was an absolute zoo on a good day. The girl claimed that I'd been running and scratched her. Even though this probably would've made for a horizontal scratch a few inches lower, I have to admit it's not impossible. Everyone ran around like little demons every morning at that hell hole and there were so many of us in one room. I could've scratched her without knowing it. Still, it isn't just the lack of any semblance of due process that I look back on and curse. It's the fact that very young children were being indoctrinated with the eye-for-an-eye concept of justice.

Do onto others whatever was done to you, isn't justice but vengeance, and there is definitely a difference between the two. Vengeance doesn't care who gets in its way. People say justice is blind, but vengeance is all teeth.

There's no concern for establishing a balance when you're acting in vengeance. What you're really doing is gratifying a destructive impulse. This is not something adults should be encouraging children to do and/or exemplifying as an option in social interactions, and yet, many of them do.

That this interchangeability between vengeance and justice may be quite widespread might help to account for the bizarre and often persecutory manner in which many victims of crime and discrimination are treated. The very word "victim" has all sorts of stigmas attached to it and most of them were pinned on just over the last two decades. I have no idea who actually invented the term "the cult of victim hood," but I do know I've heard it come out of the mouths of some hideously unattractive men in reference to women's support groups, safety networks and women's studies programs.

Still, it isn't just the lack of any semblance of due process that I look back on and curse.

Still, it isn't just the lack of any semblance of due process that I look back on and curse. It's the fact that very young children were being indoctrinated with the eye-for-an-eye concept of justice.

At the same time those phrases meant to shun and silence victims like "victim hood cult" and "professional victim" sprang up, another phrase "reverse discrimination" came into use. Whether reverse discrimination is real or not is an argument for another column, its most salient feature here is that it is intended to recast a certain group of people as victims. Now why would anybody want to be seen in that light? Maybe because a certain degree of liberty is assumed to be the rightful due of any given victim? That would explain a large part of the campaign to keep as many people from speaking out about any victimization they may have endured.

It has been my experience that the majority of people who have been victims (some prefer the term survivors) of one kind or another do not want retribution or revenge. What most victims/survivors want is acknowledgement that what happened to them was wrong, unjust, unfair. This may sound like it would be simple, but it's not, especially not when there is so much societal pressure to just be quiet and forget it. As for the dreaded compensation that many people fear victims are out for, it usually consists of changing the social environmental factors that either contributed to or facilitated the wrongs perpetrated against them.

In this respect, victims/survivors are actually more apt to be laboring for justice and not lashing out in vengeance. It may sound like I'm saying that victims/survivors have a leg up on a lot of people when it comes to abstaining from vengeance.

That's not necessarily so in every case, but I do believe your ability to discern between justice and vengeance tends to improve if you've been denied the first and/or accused by the other. The stigma that pushes the idea that all victims are hell bent on vengeance is a symptom of a collective misunderstanding about justice that leaves us all vulnerable to unfair treatment and unmerited wrath.

Feeling 'blue,' red states?

Thomas Naughton

Poor, poor conservatives. Poor red state voters — life has a way of making one regret one's choices, doesn't it? It's only April of Mr. Bush's second try at playing president and already things are souring quickly. What a shame, conservatives were convinced that their "go-to" guy had a big old "mandate" with a cherry on top, that the nation was about to obey the sign conservatives thought they had firmly planted, reading "right turn ahead."

The voting majority of the nation that was once red with pride over protecting morality and family values now seems blue, purple and even shades of nauseous green over the decisions and actions of its chosen administration — this should be Bush's real terror alert.

The once supportive AARP, the old world of our nation which adheres to dated values that the conservatives claim to uphold, is about to throw their empty prescription bottles at the republicans in a fit of rage over what Bush is planning to do to Social Security. They surely have a right to be miffed; they worked all their lives, believed the conservative promises of the Reagan era, extolled the prosperity of the Clinton days (while badmouthing his personal life), re-affirmed their belief in the republican principals of a staggering economy and military supremacy with a vote for Bush and all they got was a lousy Social Security plan.

The Christian-right is infuriated that neither Jeb nor George Bush took custody of the now dead Terri Schiavo, thereby saving her "life" and allowing her self-ish, but understandably grief-stricken parents to watch her live against her wishes. A conservative, bile-spitting columnist, Ann Coulter said, "Where's the religious fanatic we elected?" In the end, the laws surrounding the Sanctity of Marriage that the conservatives bathe the public in were the laws that undid the Bush boys, as wedding bands truly shackled and hindered their attempt at federal intervention in a private matter.

The old world is slipping away, grasping hard, but slipping nonetheless. Conservatives, drunk with their last gulp of power know the truth: their time is growing short.

How about a round of applause for that War on Terror? Or is it Operation: Spread It ("democracy," that is)? Things are going swimmingly — if you are ok with the fact that 1,534 U.S. soldiers are dead and 5,958 were wounded to bring six weeks of purgatory to the Iraqi government du jour. George, spare no expense for that democracy we all like around here, even though you and our congress defy our own laws at every chance; too bad all that military spending can't buy us a decent Intelligence Agency.

So what if some of the Iraqi's die while being liberated? Staff Sgt. Johnny M. Horne was just liberating a 16-year-old Iraqi boy whom he shot back in 2004, right? And who could forget the proud and "liberated" Iraqis with their purple thumbs thrust proudly in the air after their first time voting in decades?

What exactly did the liberated vote for? No one knows because they have no government. No one can decide the route for this now-Godly and Saddam-free populace to take, but isn't it just neat that they voted? Democratizing is hard, huh? They might never reach an agreement, they might blow each other to smithereens, but dammit at least those smithereens will be liberated and voting.

Get on your bikes people, because our "booming" economy is about to send gas prices through the roof. Speaking of roofs, how's your mortgage interest rate? High, huh? Having trouble finding a good paying job? I know America's conservatively conditioned reaction to domestic disappointment is to blame Bill Clinton, but unfortunately, he has nothing to do with this. You voted for George W. Bush. "It's the (president), stupid." I shouldn't complain, the Governator in California might hear me and call me a "girly-man." Go Team Conservatism, Whoopie!

Jerry Falwell is on his deathbed, John Paul II is resting peacefully and Tom Delay is making quasi-threats of violence against the Supreme Court. The old world is slipping away, grasping hard, but slipping none the less. Conservatives, drunk with their last gulp of power know the truth: their time is growing short.

Look around right now at our nation. All Americans want is a good job with fair wages, affordable gas, equality and politicians in office that we actually respect. This is not idealism or heavy dreaming. Our generation doesn't want what conservatives have to give.

We are the "echo-boom," the children of the baby boomers, and we're growing up. We are the most accepting generation of people to inherit the nation and that is what supremely frightens conservatives. Gay marriage is here to stay, abortion is here to stay, while war, corporate deceit and theocratic influence will be slowly but surely phased out (or at least easily monitored in the case of corporate dramas which seem inevitable in our free market).

Conservatives can try to battle our culture on T.V., radio and in Washington, but the war has already been won. We will make the new laws, we will be the new leaders unfettered by what is antiquated, "moral," unfair and restraining — all things conservative.

Finding a balance in ourselves

Colin Jones

It's all around you everyday. Light and shadow. Day and night. Wolves and deer, birds and bees. It encompasses all that is natural in the world. Balance. If you stop to think about it, the reason why you know something is funny is because you know what too is sad. Comedy. Tragedy. Light. Dark. They define each other. It works too ... as long as you don't stay in any one place for too long.

Seemingly forever, civilizations and individuals alike have created an infinite number of variations on what constitutes "the self." There is an Egyptian principle called "ka," which is composed of a balance of both how you see yourself and how others see you. During the Middle Ages, the self was thought to be determined by the balance of the four humors (bile, blood, phlegm and something else that I can't remember). Freud said it was the result of the interrelations of the id, ego and superego. The truth is, there is some merit in all of these ideas. But I'd like something a little more concrete. The answer to a question such as "who are we" is, by definition, a subjective one. I think that if we ask ourselves this question, however, most of us would probably, in some way or another, mention four things and who we think we are would somehow be determined by the balance of them.

The answer to a question such as "who are we" is, by definition, a subjective one. I think that if we ask ourselves this question however, most of us would probably, in some way or another, mention four things and who we think we are would somehow be determined by the balance of them.

The first and most obvious is the body. Physical descriptions are usually the first things that come to mind when we think of ourselves or someone else. And respecting your body is directly related to your quality of life, at least from an objective standpoint. Today, people are taking better care of their bodies than ever before. Personally, I love exercise. Lifting, running and swimming are among my favorite hobbies and the way that your body can and will respond to any stress placed upon it is fascinating. The body is an amazing machine. But that's all it is.

It seems to me that many people overemphasize either it's form or it's importance. For a long time, I did so myself. In truth, though, it's just a shell, a vehicle for moving the person inside around, and like any car, it's only as good as it's driver.

Next we have the mind. Not just education or knowledge, but rather a desire to learn. Don't get me wrong: I feel very fortunate to have an opportunity to be able to pursue higher education, and after having seen so much of the world, I have a new respect for it (which is not to say that I don't skip class from time to time or that I study constantly). However, I now can see that it's a big world out there, and just when you think you have everything figured out, you can realize that you don't. If you're open to it, tomorrow you might learn something else that can show you just how wrong you were.

Third, we have spirit. I've played this one to death in an attempt to find answers to unanswerable questions. I'm not referring to religion, but a way to see beauty and truth in the world; an inner strength that can drive you over the obstacles put in your path and a personal character that extends basic respect and kindness to others. But of course, like everyone else, I act like a jerk more often than I should, and many times I have felt crushed beneath burdens heaped upon my shoulders. It's trying that counts.

I saved the most important and hardest to develop for last. In it, we have the most to gain and lose. It is often lamented, yet curiously forgotten and it's probably the only thing that you need to be satisfied with to be glad to be alive. Heart. Not just sex, or romance, but sometimes putting the needs of someone else in front of your own. Maybe you've shut this area off, succumbing to the tunnel vision caused by personal ambition, or the fear of putting yourself on the line again. Maybe you find your defenses pushing people away, even if it's the last thing you want to do. The thing is, you only live once. So let your guard down and you might be glad you did.

Everyone, including myself, forgets once in a while that tomorrow the sun will rise. Hit the gym. Read a book. Lend a hand. Show someone you care. Getting the ball rolling is the hardest part, and if you look before you leap, you'll think of a million reasons not to do it.

U.S. and 'good Americans'

Ben Duffy

I read an column in this paper last semester from a foreign student who urged Americans to go abroad and show the world that Americans aren't the war-mongering, inbred, gauche, uncultured imperialists that they think we are. Only when Americans go overseas and apologize for all the "wrongs" perpetuated by the Bush administration will America get an image makeover. We need more "good Americans" out there to act as our ambassadors to the world.

Next year I will be studying in Germany, and I have no intention of apologizing to everyone I meet. You see, I'm not one of the "good Americans." I usually vote Republican, and I support our current war in Iraq. I don't intend to force it down anyone's throat, but I won't grovel for approval either. I'll probably avoid the subject whenever possible, but I refuse to be browbeaten into submission.

I object to the idea that our public image would improve if we all went abroad and acted ashamed of what our country is doing. It would actually reinforce the image. Let me explain.

Stern magazine, one of Germany's most popular publications, recently ran a photomontage called "USA: das gespaltene Land" ("USA: The divided land"). The series of photos was supposed to show Germans the nature of "regular Americans." But the photos told us less about "regular Americans," and more about German stereotyping.

As the title would suggest, the different photos were supposed to represent a "divided land." Not all Americans are bad, you see; just the ones who voted for Bush. Their "fair" representation of America balanced the "good Americans" against the "bad Americans." What's worse is that the second group didn't even resemble human beings. They were caricatures, living stereotypes.

The first photo was a garden-variety redneck. Overweight and fashion-challenged, he poses with a shotgun in hand, and a plethora of guns on the wall to his left. "I was born in Arkansas, in one of the hardest regions of the state," he says. "I've always had to do with guns. I personally own 75 rifles and handguns." They covered the American gun-nut stereotype, something that many Germans already believed anyway. Readers of the magazine were supposed to nod their heads when they saw this picture. Ahhh ... so they are exactly what I imagined.

Contrast that with the young, attractive accountant from Denver. "I believe that we are too arrogant, we think only of ourselves. If President Bush stays, he will ruin our country."

This woman is America's great hope. She's intelligent and professional; and whaddya-know, she agrees with German public opinion. See, Americans aren't all bad.

I object to the idea that our public image would improve if we all went abroad and acted ashamed of what our country is doing. It would actually reinforce the image.

And the gallery of stereotypes goes on. There's the Southern Holy Roller. He is described as "god-fearing," which the article juxtaposes against "enlightened," as if the two were opposites. There's also a cowboy from Wyoming who says that "the good thing about 9/11 is that more people are voting Republican." These are both "bad Americans."

Among the few people of color are the black inmate and the Latino oil workers. The black inmate is a figure of sympathy, unjustly persecuted by a racist system. "The USA is a pretty rotten country when seen from in here," he says. The Mexican workers say that their job is dangerous and that "... as Latinos without a good education, we have no other choice." The oil workers are contrasted with a white suburban family. The husband is smiling stupidly, saying, "I have always lived in one of the clean suburbs. In America, everyone has the same chances."

So there it is: America as Stern would like us to see it. It's largely racist, full of Bible thumpers and cowboys, punctuated with redneck gun-nuts. Oh yeah, and there are a few sane people in there too, but they all seem to agree with European sensibilities.

I enjoyed the reaction of Jenny Rodekuhr of Dallas, Texas. Jenny's husband is German, but she doesn't look forward to visiting Germany every summer because she knows she will have to "listen to people endlessly pontificate about the abject stupidity and insidious evil of America." Her husband is shocked about some of the things that his family members believe about America, but he faults the media for perpetuating stereotypes.

Jenny was particularly insightful when she said, "... we tend to view this as anti-American because we recognize that Germans ... don't technically think of the left as American (which is not entirely unfair as the left doesn't much, either), but rather as enlightened global citizens, such as themselves, who are being held hostage by the nutters on the right ..."

And that is why trying to pass yourself off as a "good American" does nothing to improve the American image. It doesn't make anyone think of America any differently; it only confirms in their minds that all intelligent, reasonable people agree with them. That assumption needs to be challenged.

So please, go abroad and be a good representative of America. Be respectful of other cultures; be willing to listen and to learn. But don't act ashamed. Know your facts, stand your ground and let them know that there are intelligent people who disagree with them.

Date rape needs awareness

Samantha Sharac

In the United States, the typical college itinerary includes introductory courses, underage drinking, house parties and overeating. Another feature that is relatively popular yet widely unmentioned is date rape. I am not inferring that every college student has been involved in date rape. However, the majority of college students have either been directly involved or knows someone who has.

Here at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, there have been 36 forcible sex offenses on campus in the year 2003. The year before, there were 26 forcible sex offenses. In 2001, this campus had 27 forcible sex offenses. UMass Amherst is not the only college campus with problems of sexual assault.

The Counseling Center for Human Development claims, "One in eight college women have been victims of rape." Men are also victims of rape, yet the great majority of rape victims are women. Despite the stereotype of rapists being strangers lurking in dark alleys or behind bushes, in most cases, between 35-75 percent, the female victims are raped by men who they know. This kind of rape is commonly referred to as "date rape" or "acquaintance rape."

Date rape is defined as "forced sexual intercourse in friendship or intimate relationships ... [that] occurs without the commission of another crime, thus making it an act of simple rape and a criminal act, which is difficult to prosecute." Because the victim knows her/his rapist, it is common for the defense to argue that the sexual intercourse was consensual rather than forced. Often victims do not report the crime because they feel partly responsible or they convince themselves that rape is acceptable.

A popular justification of date rape is that s/he was "asking for it." Dressing provocatively, flirting or being a "tease," being in the wrong place at the wrong time and being treated to gifts are often used as explanations for rape. None of these reasons can and should justify rape. To blame the victim is to rationalize rape for consequences of the victim's actions. If sexual conduct is not consensual and the individual verbally refuses unwanted behavior, then the individual is a victim and, following the definition of the word victim, is not to be blamed.

A popular justification of date rape is that s/he was "asking for it." Dressing provocatively, flirting or being a "tease," being in the wrong place at the wrong time and being treated to gifts are often used as explanations for rape. None of these reasons can and should justify rape.

In addition, to excuse the rapist's actions is to humanize the perpetrator's dehumanizing crime. Explanations of the victim's participating role in the rape also instill fear in people, particularly women, to adhere to certain kinds of behaviors. Most women avoid walking alone at night for the fear of sexual assault, while other women dress "conservatively" as some sort of protection against unwanted conduct. Some men and women feel responsible and pressured to participate in sexual conduct because they are expected to return the favor of being taken out on a date or receiving gifts. There is also the case when individuals feel pressured to have sexual intercourse because they have aroused their partner and do not want to be called a "tease."

Men who sexually assault women or men who are capable of sexual assault share similar patterns of behaviors. According to the Counseling Center for Human Development, men encompass "hostility toward women, misconceptions about women and their needs, domineering personality and unrealistic views of women." Men don't rape because they cannot control themselves; they rape because they want power over their partners.

To help end the prevalence of date rape, men should understand that rape is a violent form of oppression and is unacceptable. There is no reason or rationale for rape. It would be helpful for both men and women to communicate clearly with one another about their comfort level and sexual expectations.

April is Sexual Harassment Month. Educate yourself on these issues to benefit our society as a whole.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

CUTTING PELL GRANTS: A MISTAKE WE CAN'T AFFORD

The administration's recent cuts to federal financial aid for higher education send a clear message to students: when it comes to paying for college, don't count on Pell Grants. College students know better than anyone how important Pell Grants can be when it comes to paying for college — Pell is the cornerstone of financial aid in this country. But now these new cuts, coupled with the failure to raise Pell Grant award levels to keep up with rising college costs and inflation, are slowly but surely pulling the rug out from under students struggling to afford a college degree.

The President talked in his State of the Union address about increasing the size of Pell Grants, but he didn't talk about the number of students who will lose some or all of their Pell funding because of his administration's cuts.

The Government Accountability Office, an arm of Congress, has estimated that more than 50 percent of Pell recipients in states like Massachusetts will see a reduction in their Pell Grant or lose the Grant entirely. And the cuts don't stop there. The changes will have a ripple effect through other financial aid programs. According to the GAO, many students who receive work study, Perkins Loan and state grants will see cuts as well.

While we need to be fiscally responsible, we also need to do more to help students facing record-high tuition costs. I have been proud to support a number of increases to Pell over the years, but I also know that those changes aren't enough — we can't say that we have equal access to higher education in this country until Pell Grants start to catch up with the cost of getting a college degree.

To give the Pell Grant program the support it deserves, I have joined Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine to introduce a resolution that calls on the Senate to increase the maximum Pell Grant award to $9,000 per student by 2011. I also have joined bipartisan efforts calling on the administration to reverse its rollback of this grant program. Some of this pressure seems to be paying off — the budget the administration released in February proposes a modest increase to the Pell maximum award amount (currently $4,050) and an elimination of the program's current shortfall. But the budget does nothing to stop the rollback that will take Pell money from students and families already struggling with the cost of college.

The choice is simple: do we make substantial increases to Pell Grants in order to support middle and low-income students' access to higher education? Or do we tell those trying to achieve their dream of a college education that they are on their own? Without a strong Pell Grant program, we put a college degree within reach only for those who can pay their own way, and that's a mistake that we can't afford to make.

Maroon 5 rocks fans at Mullins Center

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

The Mullins Center hasn't been rocked that hard in a while. After a string of solo performances by some of the biggest names in music, Maroon 5 has resuscitated the venue's 2004-05 season. With Green Day, Velvet Revolver, Tim McGraw, The Dropkick Murphys and Nas all slated to play the Mullins Center in the next six weeks, Monday's show can only be one thing: a sign of good things to come.

But for the casual Maroon 5 fan, the one who knows little beyond the words to all the radio hits or the one who hasn't thought much about them beyond thinking the chick in the "This Love" video is hot, the band's set had to have been an eye opener. If nothing else, Monday's performance should have served to prove all those who had written Maroon 5 off as nothing more than pre-packaged pop with a rock façade very wrong.

The band, best known for their overwhelmingly popular radio hits like "Harder to Breath" and "She Will Be Loved," played a solid 90-minute set, seamlessly blending their radio tunes with the lesser known, but possibly better, tracks off their 2002 major label debut, "Songs About Jane."

Beautifully orchestrated, the concert was not just good music but a good show. The set list seemed to capture Maroon 5 at their best. Radio fans got the chance to hear the different dimensions of the band, with stellar versions of "Must Get Out," "Not Coming Home" and "Tangled" highlighting the roster. "The Sun," a track off "Songs About Jane" filled with intensity, translated well to the Mullins stage, proving to become of the night's best moments. The performance of current Maroon 5 radio favorite "Sunday Morning," complete with a singalong several thousand strong, showcased the group's ability to take a song that's been heard about a million times and make it something new and exciting.

Though each member of Maroon 5 proved their talent about 10 times over during Monday's show it was front man Adam Levine who dominated the Mullins Center from the moment the band played the first note of the first song — their break out hit, "Harder to Breathe." Despite his small stature, Levine filled the stage throughout the show. He also proved to be more than just a pretty face as he nailed his vocals establishing himself as a worthy guitarist and even put in some impressive time behind the drums. Though he had most of the females in the crowd the first time they heard the sincerity and heartache of "She Will Be Loved" on the radio, he had earned the respect of the guys in the audience too within the first few songs.

Perhaps the most surprising aspect of the evening was the performance of opening band The Donnas. An all-girl punks alt-rock band, The Donnas seemed a bizarre choice to open for Maroon 5, a group that has shared the stage with, and consequently is commonly grouped with the likes of John Mayer. It wasn't immediately clear where the rock sound of sometimes "I Love the 90s" commentators The Donnas would figure in. The ladies played a strong set and were fairly well received by the Mullins crowd, despite their opener status. It wasn't until about two songs into the Maroon 5 set that The Donnas' hard work really paid off; it then became clear to all those that had any doubt remaining that they were there to see a rock show all along.

Steve Vai
Real Illusions: Reflections
RCA

Luckily, Vai knows how to do more than shred; he's also an excellent songwriter. This is especially good news for those who are looking to hear something more interesting than guitar noodling. He is more concerned with melody than showing off his skill, and these songs are evidence of that.

The album is written as a "rock fable," and the story is explained in the liner notes, which is nice, since it would be hard to figure it out otherwise — only four of the songs have vocals. Reading the notes is optional, as the tracks hold up without the story, but it's nice to have them, as they give some insight on what Vai was attempting to do with the album.

The opening track, "Building the Church," sounds a lot like Vai trying to do Satriani's "Why," but this isn't a big problem. They're different enough that Vai can make the song his own; it proves to be an excellent, heavy opener with tons of guitar shredding. It gives way to "Dying For Your Love," an electronics-laden funeral march featuring Vai's vocals. His voice isn't amazing, but he sticks with what he can do, and the lyrics are good enough. The guitar parts are tastefully restrained, but there's still enough of a solo to make you remember whose name is on the cover.

"Glorious" is an up-tempo rock song that shows off Vai's skill as producer, with rich layers of guitar and electronic strings throughout. "K'm-Pee-Du-Wee" takes the opposite route, featuring a single guitar, bass and drums. Vai is able to take advantage of these extremes, and both tracks highlight the amount of attention he gives to writing good songs, as opposed to simply playing his guitar.

One of the album's standout tracks, "Firewall," is a funk-inspired rocker, with horns and all. Vai's vocals are much better suited to this style — he takes the opportunity to do some shouting, and his mouth percussion comes as a big surprise — and the background vocals are a nice addition. The shredded guitar solo is unnecessary, but it lits the song and keeps those who bought the album for the guitar parts happy. The next track, "Freak Show Excess," is an aptly-named, prog-inspired track showcasing Steve's guitar acrobatics. The fifty second guitar solo gets a bit annoying, prompting even Vai to say, "alright, that's enough of that nonsense," but looking at the title, you can't blame him for showing off a bit.

"Lotus Feet," the album's other pleasant surprise, is a soulful guitar ballad, as are all seventh songs on Steve Vai albums. For this one, though, Vai ditches the studio band and instead records live with the Metropole Orkest. He interacts beautifully with them, and the result is a unique blend of Vai's guitar rock and their jazz and pop orchestral stylings.

"Yai Yai," one of the album's stranger offerings, shows off some talk box work from Vai that would make Frampton blush with shame, with only an electronic metronome sound keeping time. It's interesting and fun to listen to, but it doesn't have quite the same power that the other tracks have. "Midway Creatures" makes up for the previous song's lack of power with its thundering intro and plentiful guitar solos, and the reintroduction of the band is welcome after nine minutes without them.

The second to last track is called "I'm Your Secrets," and Colson and Bissonette play percussion for Vai, who switches to an acoustic for this song. His vocals sound surprisingly good here, although the lyrics still aren't great and the whispered "cause I'm your secrets" borders on sounding silly. Vai's work on the acoustic is amazing, and this comes off as one of the more musically interesting tracks on "Reflections" as a result.

The epic finale, an eight minute track called "Underneath It All," features Vai's wife, Pia, on harp — the liner notes specify that this is "the big kind with strings," in case their was any confusion — and his son, Fire, gets a speaking part. Steve's vocal parts on this song aren't as good as they were on the previous track, but his vocals have never been the main event anyway. The guitar parts are excellent and tasteful, and he switches between an electric and acoustic throughout the song. The spoken parts are supposed to be confessional, but they aren't very convincing. If nothing else, you at least get to hear Fire Vai speak, and the album never claimed that spoken word was its strong suit.

Overall, "Real Illusions: Reflections" is exactly what a Steve Vai album should be: technically dazzling and innovative but, most importantly, interesting and complete. He manages to create a solo guitar record that might be of interest to people other than guitarists, and in the end, even most guitarists would rather listen to eleven great songs than an hour of obscure scale regurgitation and showboating. Thankfully, Mr. Vai has once again given us the former.

Jon Stewart: stand-up jokester, political opinion shaker

By Julie Hinds
Knight Ridder Newspapers

George W. Bush came out of the 2004 presidential election a winner. So did Jon Stewart.

The host of Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" was hands-down the hottest media figure of the campaign season. He was the face on the cover of all the right magazines. The hippest path to reaching the youth vote. The guy John Edwards sat next to when he declared his candidacy. The one John Kerry bantered with in a bid to seem more human.

At times, it seemed as if Stewart could do no wrong. His fake news show was voted the best news and information program by a national group of TV critics. He went toe-to-toe in a debate with Ted Koppel and didn't blink. He ventured into the spin zone with Bill O'Reilly and came out smelling like a rose. And he got CNN's "Crossfire" put on the chopping block. All of which the 42-year-old comedian ducks or downplays.

"By the way, it's only going to get better," he says when asked about his glowing reviews. "Apparently, there will never be a downslide."

What's his life like now? "Nonstop cocktail parties. A lot of glitterati, a lot of people in the know, newsmakers, opinion shakers. As a kingmaker, I have a responsibility to go out and find kings to be made."

This, of course, doesn't explain why he still performs stand-up comedy. He says he does a couple of dates a month to keep in touch with the format where he got his start.

"Ultimately, that's what I'll go back to doing when people have become sufficiently sick of me, that I'm forced once again to barnstorm the country in a beat-up van," he says from the "Daily Show" offices in New York after apologizing for running late with a writers meeting.

His stand-up shows aren't that far removed from what he does behind a desk for Comedy Central. Same sensibility. Some topical material. "A lot more nudity," he says, never content to give a boring answer. "Considerable foul language. A slurred speech that appears to be narcotic-related."

His fans know what he's like. With Stewart, you get smart, pointed jokes and equal parts amusement and outrage at the hypocrisy of those who govern and inform us as a nation.

As a celebrity figure, he's a disappointment to the tabloids. His wife, Tracey, is a veterinary technician. The two had their first child, a son named Nathan, last year. The comedians who started out in the club circuit with Stewart in the late 1980s speak well of him. He wears baseball caps and jeans when he's off-camera. During his "60 Minutes" interview, he shared an ambition that many middle-age guys can relate to: He'd love to be able to dunk.

What he doesn't have, unless he's hiding some inner Peter Jennings, is the kind of gi-normous ego that's to be expected from the biggest names in news and entertainment. For Stewart, dealing with coming off his biggest year isn't a problem because he views it as a ride that's both fun and fleeting.

"It's absolutely taken away any insecurities or self-esteem issues that had built up over my, let's say, 41 years prior of not being praised," he jokes. "It is preferable to being slammed, which I've also had. In general, I just feel that if you're on TV, people like you more than they should or dislike you more than they should. And you just have to try and continue to develop as strong an internal barometer as you can for whether or not your work is stinky."

He scoffs at the notion that he's evolved into an influential figure. (And maybe he should because when he revealed in the fall that he planned to vote for John Kerry, it didn't change the Democrat's fate.) He patiently denies he has practically become a member of the mainstream media and insists he's just a comedian who's part of a funny team that puts out a show.

"People have placed this idea that we're influential upon us, because we don't feel it," he says. "At our best, I think we're an editorial cartoon. At our worst, we're a bratty bunch of kids making poop jokes about Social Security."

When Ted Koppel pressed him about his role as a cathartic outlet of truth in humor for news viewers, Stewart insisted he was just "the dancing monkey." A Rolling Stone cover story raved that "the comedic tone of 'The Daily Show' is all deadpan irony, but the mood behind the scenes is one of intense youthful passion and even fury."

The description makes Stewart laugh, but he admits it's sometimes correct.

"The whole point of our show is to do a comedic show, but about things that we care about. ... What we do is sort of implicit. We take that direct expression and basically try to bury it under the labyrinth of fart jokes and noises. If the show is 30 minutes of stridency, then that's tedious. If you do five minutes of fart jokes, you might buy yourself one didactic moment."

When Stewart replaced Craig Kilborn on "The Daily Show" in January 1999, he was a comedian who had also acted in some movies and TV shows and briefly hosted a talk show in the mid-'90s (it started on MTV, then was syndicated) that was well-reviewed but failed anyway. Since then, "The Daily Show" audience has tripled and its pop-culture presence has multiplied like crazy. The median age of the audience is 33, although the perception is that fans are mostly college kids.

Studies by esteemed research groups have indicated that a) yes, "The Daily Show" is a news source for young viewers and b) its viewers are more likely to know things like campaign issues than people who don't watch it.

But now that the presidential race is history, the challenge for "The Daily Show" is to keep its edge and find targets as rich as the absurdities of the race for the White House. It's not as easy now to figure out what should be the focus each night, Stewart admits.

"We have to search harder to find relevant veins to mine, as opposed to being a little more illuminated by the schedule of the election," he says. "Our production content was driven by the election."

Stewart says the show's elevated profile hasn't changed the way he and the staff work. He doesn't feel an obligation to make jokes about certain topics like Social Security reform or protests in Lebanon because he must lecture his young fans about them. But he also doesn't dodge the tragic. When the Terri Schiavo case took over the headlines, "The Daily Show" led with it, doing a segment that mocked round-the-clock cable coverage. "There is a plug I would like to pull. It is to those stations," Stewart said on the air.

"Comedy is insult to injury," Stewart says. "It's always interesting that people ask what's off-limits to comedy, but not to injury. ... For some reason, making jokes about war is considered worse than war. I always wonder, 'Where do I draw the line?' I draw the line where the world draws the line."

On the list of the show's most frequent targets, the news media may be ahead of the Bush administration. The show's correspondents, performers like Stephen Colbert, Rob Corddry and Ed Helms, revel in standing in front of fake backdrops and blowing hard about whatever topic they're supposedly covering. But it's Stewart who, as the face of the show, mixes most often with the real media, whether he's questioning them as guests or appearing on their shows.

He's got a simple explanation for why media types love to interview him, and it's not pretty.

"Everything we talk about is about them," he says. "They're very fond of hearing about themselves. There's nothing that the media likes to hear about more. Look at all the shows that revolve around the media. My favorite is when a thousand of them head out to the Michael Jackson trial and then they all have a half-hour show on 'Are we doing too much on the Michael Jackson trial?' As though they have no control."

Stewart doesn't have to wonder about what he'll be doing for the next presidential election because he's signed with "The Daily Show" through 2008. He's not interested in speculating about the race yet. He says he doesn't know where the Democrats are heading with their attempts to revive and redefine the party.

"If you have a lead, I'd love to follow it. It appears right now it's much like the way the Harlem Globetrotters used to beat up on the Washington Generals. They're the Washington Generals right now."

Stewart sounds more concerned with crafting next week's jokes than sizing up what the future holds for either party. "I don't think we buy into the whole political paradigm," he muses. "So much of that world right now is a battle for supremacy between partisans. I think I fall on the side of most people, which is 'I'm busy. I wish you guys did all this better.' Most people I know don't define themselves by their party affiliation."

Jon Stewart and "The Daily Show" captivated college audiences this past election year with their witty political commentary. Audience still tune in after the election as ratings continuously climb.

Feminist voices grow through campus projects

The Clothesline Project: T-shirts decorated by victims of abuse hang along the walkways of the University of Central Florida's campus.

By Jean Patteson
The Orlando Sentinel

ORLANDO, Fla. — T-shirts of every hue wave like flags from lines strung along the breezeways on the University of Central Florida's Brevard campus.

This is not washday. It is the Clothesline Project, an event held periodically on UCF campuses to raise awareness about violence against women.

Each T-shirt is a signal of anguish or outrage. Each bears a hand-lettered message from a woman in the community: "Victim." "Survivor." "You don't deserve my tears." And heartbreakingly: "R.I.P. Baby Lei. Killed by your granddaddy."

Each shirt also is a bold, bright sign that feminism is alive and well.

"People think there's no reason for feminism anymore," says Lisa Logan, director of women's studies programs and associate professor of English on the Orlando campus. "They think we've achieved gender equality."

Not so, she says. Many women's issues remain unresolved, and feminism is as relevant today as it was in the 1960s and 70s, the tumultuous heyday of the women's liberation movement.

Even on UCF's conservative campus, feminists are a small but increasingly visible and vocal minority — thanks in part to the women's studies program, its emphasis on activism, and its dynamic director.

INSPIRATION ON ISSUES

"Many members of the women's studies faculty inspired and motivated me," says Emily Rull, 23, a leading campus activist.

"There's a lot of work to be done in areas that white, educated, middle-class women take for granted," she says, including workplace inequality, body-image issues, child care and health care.

On campuses across the country, student feminism is on the rise, says Paula Krebs, professor of English at Wheaton College in Norton, Mass., and a founding editor of the journal Feminist Teacher. And increasingly, women of color are joining the movement, along with small numbers of men.

"Especially at more conservative-identified institutions, feminist activists are finding their voices as they increasingly notice that a conservative political and social agenda is undermining women's gains, which has direct consequences for their own freedoms," says Krebs.

The focus on women's issues raised during last year's elections galvanized students to engage in feminist causes, says Elena Di Lapi, director of the Penn Center at the University of Pennsylvania. Those issues included reproductive freedom, gay rights and violence against women in war.

More recently, the firestorm over Harvard president Lawrence H. Summers' comments that innate gender factors might explain the scarcity of women in science prompted a fresh examination of feminist issues, says Ana Maria Garcia, director of women's studies at Arcadia University in Philadelphia.

Unfortunately, says Emily Miceas, professor of American studies at Stetson University in DeLand, "College students often seem reluctant to claim a feminist identity," even though "many students have a feminist consciousness."

The stereotype of feminists as ugly, strident man-haters is probably the reason students are wary of the feminist label, Miceas says.

In class, Logan uses author Bell Hooks' definition of feminism: "a movement to end sexism, sexist exploitation and oppression."

A lot of students fit that definition of feminist without even realizing it, Logan says. As for the notion that feminism is all about male-bashing, she says: "It never happens in our classes."

RESEARCH AND REFLECTION

Logan, 42, is at her favorite cafe, the Starbucks not far from her home in downtown Orlando.

"I come from a line of very strong women," she says. "I just always behaved like I could do anything, because that's what I was taught."

That changed during her doctoral studies at the University of Rochester, when she was examining the personal narratives of early American women, which often included accounts of domestic abuse.

"I was, like, 'Oh, really? This is how it works for women? This is not good,'" she says.

Another feminist was born.

After teaching at Kent State University for three years, she joined the English department at UCF in 1996 and took over the women's studies program in 2001. Since then, she has seen a succession of students experience the same feminist awakening that she had known herself.

"Most students live privileged lives, isolated from the issues we bring to the classroom," she explains. "Then they read about the issues and start to realize it's their responsibility to reach out and do something about it."

To capitalize on this impulse, service learning — or activism — is a key element of all women's studies classes at UCF. "We may matriculate only 300 students a year in the introductory course," says Logan. "So in a university with 40,000 students, how do we make a dent? Well, we create a buzz. We get our students out there doing stuff, and everybody sees them."

She recalls one student running a "wage-gap bake sale," charging men $1 for cookies but women only 76 cents to illustrate the disparity in earning power.

"When students see something like that, they get it," she says. "It's hard to argue that women really want to make less money than men."

In one of Logan's classes, women's literature of social justice, the activism portion focuses on global feminism. Students Brittany Bernstein and Katie Zepp are raising funds for Partners of the Home, a project that helps women grow vegetables in a shantytown near Cape Town, South Africa.

"I'm realizing that there is a lot I can do as an individual to make a difference," says Zepp, 19.

In high school, Bernstein, 22, didn't think feminism was pertinent to her generation. "But, in college, I realized how many issues are unaddressed," she says. "And I realize I am a feminist — not the stereotype of a man-hating radical, but someone with an ideology of equality."

COMMUNITY, SERVICE

Service learning gives students more self-confidence, which leads to action, which leads to change, says Logan. "And that's empowering."

"My hope is that when the students graduate, they're going to remain in this community, making it better," she says.

One such student is Leandra Preston, 30.

After graduating in 2000 with a master's degree in English, Preston taught in the English department for two years before being tapped as instructor and program coordinator for the women's studies program at UCF's Brevard campus in Cocoa.

Now, as Logan hoped would happen, Preston is inspiring other women to become active in women's causes — including Britta Moore, a student who helped with the recent Clothesline Project.

"The project really hit home for me," says Moore, 42. "None of us has the luxury of believing we're far removed from violence. It's going on all around us. As a woman, as a human being, I feel I have a responsibility to be active."

The project also forged in her a sense of kinship with other women, she says — and a new pride in proclaiming herself a feminist.

Twomley and Santos hit home runs but Minutemen still lose

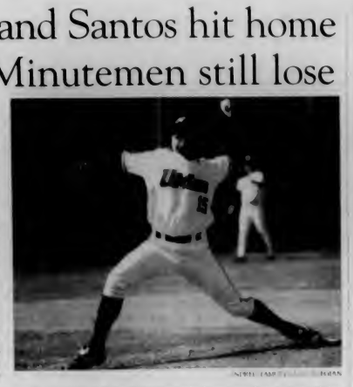
Buckley, getting caught in a rundown between first and second, allowed Tenaglia to race home, and Buckley was eventually safe at second to bring Holy Cross back ahead 4-3.

Senior Jason Twomley tied it up again in the bottom of the seventh with a monster leadoff solo shot that bounced off the roof of the maintenance building in front of the Mullins Center practice rink.



With that shot, the Fitchburg native now has six dingers on the year and has extended his hitting streak to eight games, dating back to game two of the Minutemen's three-game series against New Orleans in late February.

Tarasuik loaded up the bases by allowing a double to Tenaglia, walking Buckley and hitting Potvin square on the back with a curveball that didn't break. Tucker Frawley, hitting in place of Kistler, smashed a single to left-center that drove in two runs and put the Crusaders ahead for good.

Holy Cross tallied an insurance run in the top of the ninth, an error by Santos that allowed Aldrich to score. Aldrich had registered a single off Jason Lavorgna earlier in the inning.

NOTES: Holy Cross reliever Scott Hampe was credited with the save, his third of the year... UMass plays its second of eight straight home games this afternoon when it faces the Hartford Hawks (0-7).

This is the first meeting between the two teams since 2003, when Chris Morgan scorched the Hawks for a double, a home run and two RBI in a 9-2 drubbing of UH.

Senior pitcher Keith Doherty pitched two scoreless innings, giving up one hit with three strikeouts. Doherty is 1-4 on the season.

Many teams struggle to make money while paying rapidly increasing salaries.

The average major leaguer's salary was $2.3 million last year. While that was a slight decline from the previous year, it's twice what it was 10 years ago. Thirty years ago, players made roughly $41,000 on average.

"Baseball players definitely get overpaid," said Cynthia Walker, a pharmacist from Seattle who sees a link with steroid use. "It gives them a competitive edge to be better and they're in better position to ask for big salaries."

About 40 percent of those surveyed described themselves as baseball fans, down from more than six in 10 at the height of the home run chase in 1998 between McGwire of the St. Louis Cardinals and Sosa of the Chicago Cubs.

Baseball has no cap on team salaries and its owners don't pool money from local television revenues. Critics of the system say it favors teams in large TV markets like the New York Yankees.

Patsy Hamilton, a 61-year-old resident of Mt. Vernon, Ill., was saddened to see McGwire, who is now retired, repeatedly decline to answer lawmakers' questions about whether he used steroids. But she remains devoted to the game.

"I've always been a St. Louis Cardinals fan," she said.

The steroid controversy has blemished baseball's comeback from a devastating players' strike in 1994 that led to the eventual cancellation of the World Series.

Two on tap for Minutewomen

ance in last week's home opener against Dartmouth earned her A-10 Pitcher of the Week honors after striking out 15 batters.

LaFogg has had three games in which she struck out at least 12 batters — 14 against Cal State Northridge on Feb. 25, 12 against Florida International on March 6 and 15 last Thursday against Dartmouth.

The other half of the Minutewoman pitching squad is junior Jenna Busa, who has a save on the season and pitched a career-high 14 strikeouts in last Thursday's tie against Dartmouth.

Both Busa and LaFogg, who let up a combined 18 runs in the loss to Fordham, will be pitching against a Maine team that has managed one home run this season.

"After watching the game against Fordham, I saw a few minor adjustments that can really change our game," Sortino said. "No matter how difficult it went, and it was very difficult, we never let up and never stopped playing. None of our defense, pitching and hitting has a confidence problem."

With 26 games left in the regular season, the Maroon and White, which have had eight games canceled this season, now stand at .500.

Although the loss to Fordham puts the team in fourth place in the A-10, eight A-10 match ups remain, the next being against Saint Joseph's on April 15.

Pats ink Terrell

FOXBORO (AP) — The New England Patriots have signed free agent wide receiver David Terrell, reuniting quarterback Tom Brady with a college teammate.

Terms of the agreement, announced Tuesday, were not disclosed.

Terrell was an All-American at Michigan who left after his junior season to enter the NFL draft in 2001. He was picked eighth overall by the Chicago Bears, but in four NFL seasons he has yet to live up to the potential he displayed in college.

Terrell started 15 of 16 games for the Bears last year, leading the team with 699 receiving yards, a career high. His 42 receptions were second on the team.

Terrell was released by Chicago in February after the Bears signed All-Pro receiver Muhsin Muhammad. Terrell, who had another year left on his contract, totaled 128 receptions for 1,602 receiving yards with Chicago.

The most important victory for a legendary coach

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Roy Williams started walking slowly up the sideline as the longest three seconds of his life ticked off the clock. Instead of jumping, shouting or even pumping a fist, he calmly reached up to make sure his glasses sat squarely on the bridge of his nose.

After 17 seasons, 16 NCAA tournament appearances, five Final Fours and two losses in the title game, this was one thing that Williams had to see for himself.

Wave after wave of confetti floated down from the domed roof, over the scoreboard that read North Carolina 75, Illinois 70, and twirled in lazy spirals toward the floor. But Williams had no trouble picking his way through the maze to find the people he owed. What began as a receiving line quickly turned into a mosh pit as first Sean May, then Rashad McCants, and the rest of the Tar Heels wrapped their long-suffering coach in bear hugs.

"I'm just so happy for myself, my family and these seniors who went 8-20 and what they went through for four years," Williams said. "They took me for a heck of a ride."

All through the weekend, Williams was on the defensive, trying to explain why the ball always bounced someone else's way in the big one.

It was a torturous exercise, to be sure, listening to one of the best coaches of his generation wade through one painful memory after another, never daring to say there had to be a championship out there with his name on it. Instead, Williams retold the story of how his mentor Dean Smith, had to sweat through seven Final Fours to get his; and how one of the first things Smith did afterward was turn to Williams, his assistant then, and say with relief, "I'm not that much better a coach now than I was two and a half hours ago."

And no sooner had Williams taken his seat in the interview room Monday night, wearing a smile stretched wider than the spread collar on his starched white shirt, than he told reporters gathered in front of him, "I'm no better a coach than I was three hours ago."

That might be true, but the previous three hours required every ounce of knowledge and skill Williams picked up along the way from the playgrounds of Spruce Pine, N.C., through 15 seasons at Kansas, and the last two at Carolina, where he returned to find a once-proud program down at the heels. He had to learn to push the buttons of all those talented kids who came to play for his predecessor, Matt Doherty, and Williams had to do it quick.

Some of it was easy, like getting Sean May to slim down and muscle up so he could play with power instead of finesse. Some of it was much harder, like keeping McCants and the rest of his NBA-caliber squad happy with limited minutes and playing the disciplined inside-out style that Williams devised.

And then, those players had exactly three hours to prove not only what they'd learned, but whether they trusted each other enough to beat a fierce, opportunistic Illinois team.

That meant May had to keep pounding underneath the basket, fighting for nearly all of his 26 points and 10 rebounds. It meant Williams had to play hunches on when to go zone, and when to sit Raymond Felton, his best ballhandler, to keep him out of foul trouble. Most of all, when to sit back as a 15-point lead evaporated to zero and let the team find its own way back.

"For many years down the line, he'll always talk about this 2005 team," May said, "how special we were, and the things we did. You know, how through adversity we stuck together, even when the outside world didn't really give us a fair shot."

It only seemed that way to May, the son of former Indiana great and national champion Scott May, who celebrated his own 21st birthday with one the best performances of his career. If anything, the opposite was true.

Just about everybody expected Carolina to be here, from the Tar Heel faithful, to an alumni class that included Michael Jordan, James Worthy, Phil Ford and Sam Perkins, to revered Coach Smith, and even the pollsters, who put Carolina at No. 4 when the season kicked off.

The biggest question was whether Williams, who had this much talent at Kansas and never went all the way, could finally put the pieces together. At the end of the night, the puzzle fit and Williams took a deep breath and stepped back to assess his handiwork.

"Does it feel as good or better than I thought?" he said. "I never let myself think that far ahead to have any idea of what it was supposed to feel like."

Maybe so.

But just this once, Williams finally saw what a championship looked like with his own two eyes.

UNC coach Roy Williams sheds tears after winning the NCAA championship last night, his first as a head coach.

Minutemen fall to Crusaders

Loss to HC is eighth in a row for UMass

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Not even a nine-day layoff could work to the Massachusetts baseball team's advantage yesterday afternoon in its home-opener against the Holy Cross Crusaders.

Down 7-4 in the bottom of the ninth, senior leftfielder Curt Szado took to the plate with one out and the bases loaded.

Holy Cross	7
UMass	4

Playing in his first game since he injured his shoulder against Army back on March 19, Szado had gone 0-for-3 on the day going into his at bat in the ninth. This one was no different, as he hit into a 4-6-3 double play to end the game, giving HC its first win against UMass since 1997, and dropping the Minutemen to 3-14 (0-3 Atlantic 10) on the year.

The double play also brought a close to a day in which the Minutemen found themselves playing keep-up to the Crusaders (5-9) all afternoon.

Amidst a scoreless deadlock through the first three innings (one hit between the two squads), the Minutemen tried to break the silence in the bottom of the fourth with a bit of an unorthodox strategy.

With Bryan Adamski on first and no outs, Szado made a sacrifice bunt to advance Adamski, and in the next at bat centerfielder Derrick Durepo did the same. With two outs and Adamski in a scoring position, Mike Weiner was called out when he couldn't check his swing.

UMass coach Mike Stone says the high-risk maneuver of having the No. 4 and 5 hitters bunt was not the intent.

"The guys missed their signs, we weren't bunting in those situations," Stone said. "Well, I wasn't, but they were. I don't know how they missed the signals, but they did. We had a miscommunication."

Although pitchers Matt Torra and Keith Doherty kept the Crusaders hitless through four, the bats finally cracked through the walls in the top of the fifth after Stone replaced Doherty with reliever Dave Sullivan. Sullivan proceeded to walk his first batter, Steve Buckley, and then gave up a broken-bat single to rightfield to Tom Potvin. Erik Kistler and Mike Marron both hit RBI singles off Sullivan later in the inning.

Anthony Santos provided UMass with a brief lead in the next stanza when he nailed his first career home run, an opposite-field three-run shot over right, to put the Minutemen up 3-2. It was just his fourth hit of the season.

ANDREW TABET/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Sophomore first baseman Bill Rankin fields a throw in time to record an out during yesterday's game against Holy Cross. The Crusaders won the game 7-4.

Holy Cross took the lead right back in the top of the sixth, this time off of freshman Brent Tarasuik (0-1), who recorded the loss. Potvin hit a sac-fly to right, driving in Mike Schell from third. Sweeney was next to bat, and with runners at the corners (Buckley at first, Andrew Tenaglia at third) the Crusaders

UM gears up for A-10 tourney against Rams

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (11-6, 3-0 Atlantic 10) is coming into the final stretch of the regular season. Today, the Minutewomen take on Fordham (9-4) at the Upper Boyden Courts for their final A-10 match before the conference tournament.

UMass comes in on a four-game winning streak and wins in five of their last six matches. Last Wednesday, the Minutewomen blanked Rhode Island, 7-0 in Amherst.

The Maroon and White swept every match it played. No singles match went past two sets, and in doubles competition, URI was held below three points in all three matches.

UMass coach Judy Dixon says practice has been going well this week given the recent weather in Amherst.

"We've practiced as best we could this week," Dixon said. "This time of year, with the cold and tough weather, makes it hard to be consistent."

A big advantage for the Minutewomen is that the whole team is healthy right when they need to be, an obvious advantage this late in the season.

Fordham comes to Amherst having its last two matches either cancelled or postponed due to rain. The last time the Rams were in action was March 31 against Stony Brook. Fordham was able to pull out the victory by a score of 4-3.

"Fordham is always good," Dixon said. "They are always good and usually come prepared."

The Minutewomen lead the all-time series with a record of 7-1 against the Rams. The last time these two teams met was April 2, 2004, at a neutral site. Senior captain Sasha Edelstein and junior Dorothy Iwanowicz were both able to pick up singles victories in that match.

Edelstein shutout her opponent 6-0, 6-0 at No. 3. Iwanowicz also blanked the competition 6-0, 6-0, playing in the No. 5 slot.

"We can't take Fordham lightly," Dixon noted. "They are better than last year and always play us tough."

Lately Iwanowicz has been able to give the Minutewomen strong play mainly from the No. 4 position in the lineup. Her singles record of 12-3 is second only to sophomore Michele Spiess's mark of 14-3.

"Even though she has a real good record, Dorothy feels that her tennis game is still improving," Dixon said. "In terms of technique she has a really sound game."

Iwanowicz has also been teaming with Edelstein and junior Susan Johnson in doubles competition. As a duo, Iwanowicz and Edelstein have compiled a record of 4-1 in the No. 1 slot. Johnson and Iwanowicz are 9-5 when paired together.

Even though UMass has been able to win 11 matches this season, Dixon still sees much room for improvement. According to the coach, she feels that the No. 5 and No. 6 slots could be performing better.

"We're going to work at the 5 and 6 a lot in the coming weeks," Dixon said. "Look for Susan [Johnson] and Jana [Bartolini] to vastly improve come the conference tournament."

Another concern expressed by Dixon is the team's lack of experience. The team is loaded with freshmen and sophomores whose age could be a disadvantage as the pressure mounts in the time leading up to the tournament.

"Sasha [Edelstein] and Dorothy [Iwanowicz] need to help the younger kids," Dixon said.

Minutewomen get crushed at home by Dartmouth

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team let it get away early yesterday at Garber Field against the seventh-ranked Dartmouth Big Green, as they were on the short end of an 18-6 rout.

Dartmouth	18
UMass	6

With about 19 minutes left in the first half UMass' Kerri Connerty tied the score at one on a free position shot, but from that point on it was all Green as Dartmouth went on a 10-0 run that lasted almost 17 minutes.

The first half ended with a score of 11-1 as Dartmouth controlled the ball on offense for a good portion of the opening half.

Almost every time the Minutewomen did gain possession, a turnover ensued and put UMass back on defense.

As a result Dartmouth out-shot UMass 25-4 in the first half and 37-17 overall, far fewer than UMass coach Carrie Bolduc's desired team average of 30 shots per game. Bolduc did remain positive after the game though, despite the 12-goal loss.

"Use [the game] to learn and motivate, there's a lot they can learn from it like how tough teams play discipline-wise and what we have to do to play up to that level," Bolduc said.

"The girls aren't down; it kind of sets our standards and expectations even higher for the A-10 season because it's a new season for us that starts Friday."

One bright spot in the game for UMass was the impressive play of junior Kerri Connerty who had five of the Minutewomen's six goals.

"She wants the ball and is becoming a natural leader, and she wants to get the job done," Bolduc said.

"We just need more of that type, we can't have one person like that, and we're working on it. Like I said, we're young, and we're developing. It takes time. It's really not going to come their freshman year."

The youth of the team once again showed against the more experienced Big Green as the Minutewomen seemed overmatched in many aspects of the game, most notably on offense where Dartmouth suffocated the UMass attackers and forced most of the total 16 turnovers they had.

"Defensively we hung with them in the beginning, and really we had momentum," Bolduc said.

"We just had issues catching and throwing the balls ... I think it may have been a different halftime score if we had possessed the ball on attack, and it was as simple as that. They're talented, they're skilled, they're fast, their fast break is good and they have a good goalie, but you know, we can still get there. I think we're just as good."

Although Bolduc won't admit it, the team must be relieved to get through the hardest part of their schedule where they faced four top 15 teams.

Coming up is the Atlantic 10 segment of the schedule starting with La Salle on Friday and Saint Josephs on Sunday, both at home.

"I enjoy the challenge; I think it's good for our team to play [better teams] versus playing [worse teams] because that doesn't prepare us for the A-10's. In a way, I imagine some of these games might be, not effortless," Bolduc hesitated, "but I hope they're effortless, and that it comes easy to them. We're looking forward to A-10's; I think they're prepared and ready."

WASHINGTON — Two-thirds of Americans say baseball players found to have used steroids should be barred from the Baseball Hall of Fame, an Associated Press-AOL poll found.

Player's high salaries were named as baseball's "biggest problem" by 33 percent of those surveyed, followed by steroids at 27 percent and the cost of going to a game at 22 percent, according to the telephone poll done for the AP and AOL Sports by Ipsos-Public Affairs.

Public attention to steroids in baseball was heightened last month by a nationally televised congressional hearing in which sluggers including Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa were called before a House panel.

Most Americans surveyed favor Congress' intervention, and four in 10 said lawmakers should do more.

"Somebody needs to take control of the situation," said Eric Chlebisch, a physician's assistant from Johnson City, Tenn. "In this case, it falls to the federal government."

Baseball players and owners last month put in place a tougher policy against performance-enhancing drugs following increased attention created by a federal grand jury investigation into illegal steroid distribution.

Under baseball's new policy, first-time offenders would be suspended for 10 days. It would take four positive tests for a player to be suspended for a year. Some in Congress contend the policy is too lenient.

Tampa Bay's Alex Sanchez, who has denied using steroids, became the first player suspended Sunday.

Thirty-eight minor league players were suspended Monday for violating the minor league steroids policy.

Although steroids are dominating attention, "the economics of baseball are the big problem," said Fay Vincent, former baseball commissioner. "The big clubs make a lot of money and the little clubs don't."

LaFogg and Busa slated to start doubleheader

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

After a trip to Fordham on Monday that resulted in two losses, the Massachusetts softball team (11-11-1, 2-2 Atlantic 10) will look to rebound, as it takes on Maine (7-14) this afternoon at home.

This will mark the second home game of the season at the UMass Softball Complex, where the Maroon and White have an all-time record of 86-5-1.

In today's contest, UMass coach Elaine Sortino looks to take down the Black Bears, which, despite a 7-14 record, have not lost since March 20.

One weapon that the Minutewomen are planning to stop is junior pitcher Sarah Bennis, who has a season ERA of 1.77 and 59 strikeouts in nine appearances.

"Don't let their record fool you, Maine is a good team," Sortino said. "We had a tough game with them last year and they made the NCAA tournament, so you can't look at their record and think they're a bad team."

To counter the Maine pitching attack, UMass will depend on its array of batters, who have tallied 13 home runs this season.

The regulars include both first-year freshmen and seasoned veterans.

Senior catcher KJ Kelley leads the team in slugging percentage with a .625 clip and is second on the team in batting average with .321.

Kelley has been playing in all of the recent games, despite a right ankle injury that has caused her to wear a brace.

"[Kelley] is a warrior," Sortino said. "Something like that might be tough for someone else, but not for KJ."

Ahead of Kelley on that list is rookie Lauren Proctor, who has a season batting average of .349, nine RBI and has started every game for the Maroon and White. Although Proctor has turned heads with her 63 at-bats on the season, Sortino knew that she would be an immediate factor during her freshman campaign.

Seniors Hillary Puglia and Denise Denis each have over a .500 slugging percentage, with Denis leading the team in RBI with 20 on the season.

Massachusetts owns a pair of pitchers who will be facing a Maine squad that is led by senior Lauren Dulkis, who has a batting average of .338 on the season. UMass senior Barb LaFogg leads the A-10 with 93 strikeouts on the season and holds a season ERA of 2.65. Her perform-

Payano has first SGA meeting as President

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Newly elected President of the Student Government Association Pavel Payano announced at last night's meeting that he plans to hold a roundtable discussion next week in order to voice opposition against Chancellor John V. Lombardi's diversity commission recommendations.

According to the lengthy report issues March 12, the recommendations would cast an umbrella over all of the registered student organizations, clubs and groups on campus. This recommendations has drawn large opposition and Payano and others plan to voice their opinions next Tuesday at 5 p.m. (location TBA)

"I will be hosting an SGA roundtable next week and we will be discussing the Community Action Plan and the Chancellor's plan," he said.

Currently, Lombardi has allowed at question and answer forum for students to voice their opinions and ask for clarifications on certain issues."

"The Chancellor has set up a Q and A segment on Campus Diversity and he will be responding to e-mails about his action plan."

Payano also urged community members to voice their opinions in addition to senate members so that there is diverse feedback. He told Senators that there will be a rally, held by Take Back UMass and the Graduate Employee Organization in opposition of the recent recommendations next Wednesday, at noon at the Student Union Steps.

"[The Commission Recommendations] are not straight forward," Payano said, "we still don't know why [Lombardi] is tackling the SGA."

In the initial report, it was mentioned that a vice chancellor would be hired to uphold the new standards of diversity on campus and that certain elements of the SGA would be overseen by this person, a concept that SGA members disagree with.

Speaker Mark Morrison said that he agrees with Payano that students need to voice their opinions on the report, however he praised both Lombardi and the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano for clarifying the 82-page report.

"Vice Chancellor Gargano also released something to clarify the student affairs portion," he said.

However, he noted that there is still more work to be done.

"We need to draft a collaborative response," Morrison said. "[the Chancellor] said how we would have no say over money, and he's not kidding around this time."

He, like Payano encouraged students to voice opinions.

"We need to get what we want," Morrison said, "and bargaining for what we want from the administration."

Morrison also mentioned that the end of the discussion period about the recommendations will end April 22.

"Then the Chancellor will have time to digest [the issues] and re-write a second draft."

In other orders of business, a motion was drafted by the Administrative Affairs Committee to elect three new senators to the SGA despite the tardiness of the order. Members of the senate criticized the committee for not bringing the order to the meeting sooner and that with only five meetings left, these students would not be able to make informed decisions on important orders of business.

Morrison debated against the election of the senators because of the importance of the final meetings.

"These three cant make informed decisions. I admire their determination [to be in Senate] but they must have some competency."

Morrison noted that during the last three meetings, the executive cabinet will be chosen, a new speaker will be elected and most importantly the budget will be allocated.

He added that new senators are "very impressionable right now," and they should be coming in with "fresh new ideas."

After debate, the special order to approve Lenz Bayass, Elvis Mendez and Tessa Simones failed.

In other orders of business, a motion was passed that creates the "Worcester Breakfast Sandwich" as a meal option in the dining commons instead of the "mundane" scrambled eggs that are served seven days per week.

Last week the Sylvan area government results were not published. Area Governor is Alan Chou, Lit. Governor is Jillian Promisel, Treasurer and Secretary is Andrew Hein.

New Student Government Association President Pavel Payano is planning a roundtable discussion next week to oppose the Diversity Commission recommendations.

Lombardi hosts Q&A session on commission

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Chancellor John V. Lombardi posted a question-and-answer report on the Commission for Campus Diversity's Web site yesterday as he responded to several criticisms on his plan.

On March 12, Lombardi posted a "Draft Action Plan" on the Commission's Web site in which he responded to its initial recommendations. Immediately, many people on campus met the plan with skepticism and Lombardi said he would make revisions.

Various groups on campus spoke out about their anger towards Lombardi's not granting the Commission's recommendation for hiring a new Vice Chancellor for Diversity.

In the Q&A, Lombardi said why he didn't grant that recommendation.

"A Vice Chancellor for Diversity would need to have a significant portfolio of responsibility and the authority to manage the budget necessary to implement that responsibility," Lombardi said on the Web site.

"The segregation of diversity-orientated activities in one office relieves all other parts of the institution of responsibility for these issues."

French awarded Truman Scholarship

By Jake Monte
Collegian Correspondent

Jesse French, who transferred to UMass last September from Albuquerque New Mexico, was awarded the prestigious 2005 Truman Scholarship, a thirty thousand dollar scholarship award.

The Truman Organization looks for students who show leadership and intellectual ability, and are likely to make a positive difference in the world. 75 students from 65 colleges were selected from the 600 applicants. John Bingham, a political science professor whom French describes as his most influential teacher, recommended French apply for the award, and is the Truman Organization's UMass sponsor.

"Jesse is pretty quiet but at the same time a terrific speaker and listener. He was in my class last fall. That is how I got to know him," Bingham said. "The Truman provides a lot of money so we get a few inquiries about it, but it also takes a lot of work so not too many students want to go through the whole process," he added.

French, however, was willing to tackle the process, and contacted Susan Krauss Whitbourne who directs the Office of National Scholarship Advisement.

He submitted his application sometime in January.

She assisted French in preparing his application. According to Whitbourne, the application process takes about four months because it's a very intricate application.

Part of the application consists of essays, in which French described his leadership service and governmental activities. French also had to come up with a proposal for creating a homeless shelter in Albuquerque, New Mexico.

In his proposal, French emphasized the need for public transportation. He also required that those staying in the shelter be registered to vote.

"This is distinctive in that it presents an opportunity for a population to procure some political power," French said.

At UMass, Whitbourne and her staff set up a mock interview to prepare French.

"We really grilled him," Whitbourne said. "We had about eight faculty. We asked him a lot of questions about his application

Floral experts host flower exhibition

By Jennifer Gorson
Collegian Correspondent

These days, anyone have a wedding fit for a celebrity. Just enlist the help of Deryck DeMatas and Daniel Vaughn, florists for the rich and famous.

On Wednesday last week, the University of Massachusetts Stockbridge School of Agriculture hosted a program showcasing floral designs by the two nationally recognized floral artists. While catering students from Hospitality and Tourism management provided refreshments, the two showed off their event décor expertise.

DeMatas and Vaughn, previously featured in national publications such as In Style magazine, demonstrated their refined technique for two hours to the packed crowd in the Student Union ballroom. They also discussed selecting flowers and the interplay of bloom textures and colors.

From the vast array of fresh flowers set out on the table before them, the two men created centerpieces and beautiful bouquets on the spot. A video screen focused in on the stage, broadcasting the details of their skill to the awed crowd, while light jazz played in the background.

The designers kept up a friendly banter throughout their work, typical of two artists engrossed in creative production and which added to the relaxed yet sophisticated atmosphere of the event.

"Can I get that for $5?" Vaughn joked as DeMatas skillfully put together a bouquet of 100 fresh

Explosion rocks Northeastern dorm

BOSTON (AP) — A natural gas explosion sent flames shooting through a Northeastern University dormitory on Wednesday, injuring seven people and severely damaging the six-story brick building.

Victims were being treated at area hospitals for minor injuries, including broken bones, cuts and burns, said Richard Serino, the city's emergency services director. The injured included students, faculty, staff and a utility worker sent to investigate the gas leak.

"One person reported he was thrown 10 feet into the air" before he was hit and injured by a falling table, Serino said.

A Boston Fire Department spokesman said the explosion was likely caused by gas leak in the boiler room of Kerr Hall, in the city's Fenway neighborhood.

Students and other onlookers gathered outside as firefighters battled the blaze that followed the explosion. Glass from broken windows was scattered on the ground around the building.

Alex Zinni, a 23-year-old from Mansfield, said he was eating lunch with fellow students around 1:30 p.m. when black smoke and orange flames filled the second-story dining hall.

"I was tossed up, tossed down, and I heard people say, 'Go!'" said Zinni, who was unhurt. "I felt like I was lifted."

He said he ran to safety out the front door of the building, which houses dormitories and a faculty center.

Issues of race addressed

Eduardo Bustamante, were upset at Lombardi's ignoring of the commission's student affairs recommendations.

Bustamante said that Lombardi's "Draft Action Plan" accepted all 12 of the Commission's academic recommendations, but rejected all 11 of the Commission's recommendations on student affairs.

Bustamante proposed an alternative proposal to diversity-related issues on campus. Lombardi has since posted the proposal on the Commission's Web site.

Many members of the SGA strongly opposed Lombardi's plan since the SGA would fall under the new Center for Student Development that Lombardi proposed. A newly appointed Associate Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs would run the center.

In the Q&A, Lombardi addressed these concerns.

"The draft plan did not fully explain the relationship to the Student Government Association," he said. "The Student Government Association and other student organizations do not have the authority to hire or supervise the University employees who work with various student groups and activities. All of the groups that have permanent University employees currently funded by Student Government have been, and will continue to be organized as part of the Office of Student Affairs."

"SGA will of course continue to have the authority to review expenditures from SGA funds and determine future expenditures each year," Lombardi added.

Ever since the infamous "KKK-9" incident at UMass, diversity on campus has been an issue that many people are concerned about. During the Q&A, Lombardi said why he thought people are so emotional about such issues.

"Issues of race, class and gender in America have been and continue to be very difficult to discuss and often evoke strong emotions," he said. "The most effective approach to these issues is to listen carefully to identify these issues and problems that underlie expressions of pain and anxiety and disappointment."

All of these documents can be viewed on the Commission's Web site at umass.edu/campusdiversity.

and his specific proposals to help the homeless."

French was interviewed by the scholarship selection committee on March 14 in Phoenix. He was informed that he was accepted on March 29.

"I was very excited and at the same time the first thing that passed through my mind was 'Wow, I've got to call all the people who helped me with this process and thank them.' I'm still getting around to thanking everybody. I was thrilled."

The next step for French is applying for a Marshalls Scholarship and Rhodes Scholarship. If he were to receive those two scholarships he would end up in Oxford, England for graduate school. French has also considered John Hopkins for graduate school. He aspires to work for an organization such as the Brookings Institution, writing articles which contribute to political and economic policy.

The articles are put on a Web site and experts from the New York Times and other major newspapers use them for background information. The articles are also used to by Congressional Committees to make laws.

French says he also has a special interest in neoclassical theory which is the basis for modern capitalism as first laid out by Adam Smith in "The Wealth of Nations."

French's teachers were unanimous with praise for him. Economics Professor Stephen Resnick said, "he has the talent and maturity to do well and I hope he is able to maintain his interest in making society a better place for all its citizens."

Fossil may be oldest ancestor

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

Is a fossil creature that grabbed headlines three years ago really the earliest known ancestor of modern humans? Or does it belong elsewhere on the evolutionary tree?

The answer has been hotly debated, but now two studies argue that it does indeed belong on the human branch.

In 2002, scientists announced finding jaw fragments, some isolated teeth and a skull of a creature nicknamed "Toumai" in Chad. At some 6 million to 7 million years old, the fossils came from around the time of a major split in the evolutionary tree, with one branch leading eventually to humans and the other branch leading to chimps.

The researchers argued that the creature, which they dubbed "Sahelanthropus tchadensis", belongs on the human branch and so is the oldest known hominid. Some others disagreed. In any case, the skull provided a puzzling combination of human and chimp traits and raised what one expert called "a wheelbarrow full of questions" about evolution at that time.

Many scientists now think S. tchadensis was probably a hominid, and more evidence appears in Thursday's issue of the journal Nature. It comes from Michel Brunet of the University of Poitiers in France, who led the team that made the original discovery, and colleagues.

Other experts said the new work strengthens the case for hominid status but doesn't clinch it.

"This isn't a smoking gun," said David Begun of the University of Toronto.

A big question is whether S. tchadensis walked upright, because that's a key characteristic of hominids. Brunet, in an e-mail, said given the available evidence it would be a "great surprise" if it didn't walk upright. But he agreed with other scientists that to be sure, scientists would have to find and analyze skeletal bones that carry signatures of upright walking, like a knee, hip or foot.

Vatican sets date for conclave

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — The College of Cardinals on Wednesday set April 18 as the date for the historic start of the conclave to elect a successor to Pope John Paul II, as the Vatican made final arrangements for the funeral that is expected to draw millions of pilgrims and world leaders to Rome.

The decision came after the cardinals read John Paul's spiritual testament during a pre-conclave meeting Wednesday. Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said, adding that the text would be released on Thursday.

Navarro-Valls said the cardinals would celebrate a morning Mass on April 18, then be sequestered in the Sistine Chapel in the early afternoon to start the conclave.

According to church law, prelates are expected to hold at least one ballot on the first day of a conclave. If no one gets the required two-thirds majority after about 12 days, cardinals may change procedure and elect the pope by simple majority.

The date was set on the third day of preparatory meetings of cardinals who have converged on Rome ahead of Friday's funeral and burial of John Paul.

Pilgrims continued to flock to St. Peter's Square on Wednesday, jamming up streets as they waited to pay their final respects to John Paul, who has been lying in state in St. Peter's Basilica since Monday afternoon.

President Bush also arrived in Rome to attend Friday's funeral and immediately went to St. Peter's Basilica to view the pontiff's body.

Bush, his wife, Laura, former Presidents George H. W. Bush and Bill Clinton, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and chief of staff Andrew Card knelt before the pope's bier in St. Peter's Basilica for about five minutes, their hands clasped in prayer, after being ushered in by a side door.

The general public filed past the crimson-robed body on the other side of the bier during Bush's visit.

More than 1 million pilgrims will have filed solemnly by the crimson-robed body by the end of Wednesday, according to calculations by the Italian civil defense department.

Overwhelmed Italian officials warned people face a 24-hour wait to see the body and said they will cut off the line, which snaked down a wide boulevard, through ancient alleyways and onto a bridge, on Wednesday evening.

The civil defense department was flashing messages on highway panels and sending out text messages on cell phones to warn people of the closure, which will allow officials to clear the basilica on time and prepare it for Friday's funeral, spokesman Luca Spoletini said.

John Paul's spiritual testament, read Wednesday, was a 15-page document written in his native Polish over the course of his pontificate starting in 1979, a year after he was elected.

NE holds on gay marriage ban plans

By Robert Tanner
Associated Press

It seems a can't-lose proposition: Ask voters to ban same-sex marriages and they consistently endorse the idea, from the South to the West.

Kansas on Tuesday became the latest and 18th state to pass a constitutional amendment barring gay marriage. With conservatives pushing to define marriage as between a man and woman throughout the country, similar proposals are on the ballot in three other states next year and more than a dozen are considering them.

New England has been the major holdout; there, legislators and judges have strengthened rights for gays and lesbians.

Kansas voted by a more than 2-to-1 margin Tuesday to ban gay marriages and civil unions, and voters also ousted the lone gay city council member in Topeka, Tiffany Muller, who had defeated an emphatically anti-gay opponent in the primary.

But Connecticut legislators seemed headed in the other direction Wednesday, scheduling a vote to legalize civil unions. If the bill becomes law, Connecticut would be the only state to do so without a court order demanding lawmakers act.

The New England examples — most decisively Vermont's civil unions and Massachusetts' legalized gay marriages — are seen by ban supporters as the threat that's helping their cause. Advocates for gay marriage also see those examples as a plus, by proving that fears gay marriage will somehow destroy society's social fabric are unfounded.

"The more places that we are able to extend the same rights and responsibilities to all Americans, the more places we've got a light to shine on what's happening," said Jue Solmonese, president of Human Rights Campaign, a gay rights lobbying group.

"Massachusetts, the last time I checked ... is still there. Marriage is still there," he said. "People are going on with their lives, gay and lesbian couples are raising their families and living their lives like everyone else. None of what has been forecasted or what we've been warned about seems to have happened there."

New England states aren't the only ones to offer gay rights activists hope. California, Hawaii and New Jersey also allow for domestic partnerships — though California and Hawaii also have states laws that define marriage as between a man and a woman.

Connecticut offers the strongest recent pro-gay legislation, by extending all rights and privileges of marriage to same-sex couples but without an actual marriage license.

24-year-old held for fatal beating

NORTH ADAMS, Mass. (AP) — A 24-year-old man was being held Wednesday on $1 million bail in the fatal beating of another man.

Jason Ostrander, 24, pleaded innocent Tuesday in Northern Berkshire District Court to killing 47-year-old Edward Tetreault, who was found unconscious shortly after 11 p.m. Monday in a Main Street apartment. He died later at North Adams Regional Hospital.

"This was a vicious beating," District Attorney David F. Capeless said during Ostrander's arraignment.

Autopsy results released Wednesday said Tetreault suffered from fractures, bruising and lacerations around his face.

UMass SAIFD helps in floral showcase

red roses.

"You hogged the table, I have to get even," DeMatas later added when asked for some extra twine by Vaughn.

The two designers specialize in different pieces. Deryck designed many detailed table settings and centerpieces. Vaughn specialized in hand-tied bouquets that members of the UMass branch of SAIFD, the Student American Institute of Floral Designers, walked down the center aisle to let audience members get a better look at the intricate detail and "movement" involved.

Bouquets included a bridal bouquet that trailed in a cascade with crystals glued to the center of each flower, 50 white tulips with carefully manicured or "defoliated" stems, and chocolate, merlot, and butterscotch tinted roses tied with strung berries instead of ribbon.

Mixing textures is the key to an eye-catching bouquet; as Vaughn said, "never put two shinies or two fuzzies together and you'll be fine."

The event table decor, on the other hand, displayed DeMatas' love for detail. His arrangements ranged from a popular setting for a bat mitzvah to an elegant decoration for a ladies' luncheon.

His centerpieces included a birch log with flowers on it; martini glasses, floating candles, and rhinestones in wooden boxes; and an Asian-influenced beaded mat setting — all of which were accented by beautiful flower arrangements. All of the foliage was gathered from the greenhouse at UMass.

"You guys have the most incredible freesias I've ever seen!" DeMatas gushed.

According to DeMatas, you should not strive for perfection, and just let the flowers be.

"If you can communicate with the flower, it will tell you exactly where to go." Both designers agreed that details and originality are the key strategy for pleasing floristry. Designers need to stretch themselves to avoid creating "just another pot of flowers on the table," said Vaughn.

Each designer's final products were met with enthusiastic applause.

A mutual love of flowers united most of the crowd, busy scribbling notes and taking down information for their own work.

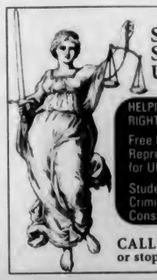
The affable artists drew the audience in with their extensive knowledge, and the beautiful colors and designs, rapidly being produced one after the next, entranced even the inexperienced florist.

"The designers were so enthusiastic — even laymen can get excited about it," said an audience member who drove up for the event because his daughter is in the SAIFD.

The professionals joked that you reduce your income by half by going into the floristry industry, but added, "there's no price tag on love."

Vaughn advises any of those who are interested in going into the business to go to the local chapter's Web site www.saifd.org, which includes information on the well-known program at UMass. Floristry is an art form, and he advises finding a good school and looking out for a professional whose style you admire, and then trying to get a chance to work under them.

DeMatas adds that the most rewarding part of his profession is "bringing joy to the heart." Like a doctor, he said, "it's my contribution to healing the human heart. You're not just selling pretty parties — you're selling emotion."



Such is the difference between designing flowers for weddings, birthday parties, and even funerals, where sympathy is the main focus.

On a final note, Dementas said, "enjoying your job is half the battle. I love my work." Luckily, judging from his extensive clientele, the rest of the world agrees.

Hale sentenced to 40 years

CHICAGO (AP) — Avowed white supremacist Matthew Hale was sentenced to 40 years in prison Wednesday for trying to have a federal judge killed, the same judge whose husband and mother were murdered five weeks ago by a deranged man with no connection to Hale.

Hale, the 33-year-old leader of a group that preaches racial holy war, was sentenced after a rambling, two-hour speech in which he claimed he was the victim and even recited part of "The Star Spangled Banner." He showed no emotion and sat staring at the defense table as the sentence was handed down.

Prosecutors argued for the maximum sentence, saying Hale's crime amounted to an act of terrorism, and the judge agreed.

"Mr. Hale is not concerned about taking someone's life, but rather how to do it without getting caught," U.S. District Judge James Moody said in imposing the sentence. "I consider Mr. Hale to be extremely dangerous and the offense for which he was convicted to be extremely egregious."

Hale was convicted in April 2004 of soliciting an undercover FBI informant to murder U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow of Chicago in retaliation for her ruling against him in a trademark dispute.

White supremacist Matthew Hale was sentenced to 40 years in jail for attempting to murder a judge.

Prosecutors said Hale was furious that Lefkow ordered him to stop using the World Church of the Creator name for his group. Lefkow said the name was trademarked by an Oregon-based church group.

Mexican immigrants continue to attempt US border crossings

By Olga R. Rodriguez
Associated Press

AGUA PRIETA, Mexico — The number of Mexican migrants trying to sneak into the United States through the Arizona border has dropped by half since hundreds of American civilians began guarding the area earlier this week, say Mexican officials assigned to protect their citizens.

But that doesn't mean the migrants have given up. Most remain determined to enter the United States and say they will simply find other places to cross.

Before Minuteman Project volunteers began patrolling, Mexican officials encountered at least 400 undocumented migrants daily. On Monday, the second day Minutemen were present, they spotted just 198, said Bertha de la Rosa of Grupo Beta, a Mexican government-sponsored group that discourages people from crossing illegally and aids those stranded in the desert.

Courtesy AP/CNN

The number of Mexican immigrant illegally entering the United States are dropping due to American civilians guarding the boarder.

"The fact that we're not seeing them here doesn't mean they are not trying to cross," said de la Rosa, the group's coordinator in Agua Prieta, a town across the border from Douglas, Ariz. "They say they will look for another place or wait awhile — but they are not giving up."

Grupo Beta, along with armed state police officers, began patrolling the Mexican side of the border on Sunday.

Jose Luis Mercado is among those determined to cross.

Mercado, a farm worker from central Mexico state, was one of 10 migrants who walked through the desert all night Monday and early Tuesday before they were abandoned by the smuggler they had paid to get them across the border.

"He just said it was too risky to cross and to wait for him, but he never came back," Mercado said.

Mercado, like most migrants trying to cross into the United States from this dusty border city, had been unaware of the Minuteman Project, despite extensive news media coverage of the group.

He and his companions were resting in a ditch littered with plastic bottles, clothes and empty tuna cans when they were spotted by Grupo Beta agent Hector Salazar.

Discovery launch put on hold

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla.(AP) — The rollout of space shuttle Discovery to the launch pad was briefly put on hold Wednesday after a crack was discovered in the foam insulation on the external fuel tank. But NASA later said the crack was no reason for concern.

The flaw was discovered as the spacecraft was being readied for the first shuttle launch since Columbia fell to pieces two years ago, a disaster blamed on a chunk of foam that fell off the tank during liftoff and gashed one of the wings.

NASA spokeswoman Jessica Rye described the flaw as a hairline crack and said that after sending images of it to the tank's manufacturer in Louisiana, the space agency concluded it did not need to make any repairs.

NASA then began moving Discovery from its assembly building to the launch pad, after a delay of at least two hours.

Because of Columbia's disintegration over Texas in 2003 — and the deaths of all seven astronauts aboard — the tank has been extensively redesigned for Discovery's flight.

"It doesn't sound like it's a major issue, but because the foam is a sensitive issue we want to make sure we're in a safe and right configuration," Rye said when the crack was discovered.

A delay in the moving of Discovery to the launch pad could upset NASA's plans for a mid-May liftoff. The launch window runs from mid-May to June _ a period dictated by the position of the international space station, the shuttle's destination.

The Discovery was being moved on a 5.5 million-pound transporter, a huge platform on caterpillar tracks, along a specially built road that is almost as wide as an eight-lane highway. The 4.2-mile journey to the launch pad was expected to take hours, since the transporter moved at only 1 mph.

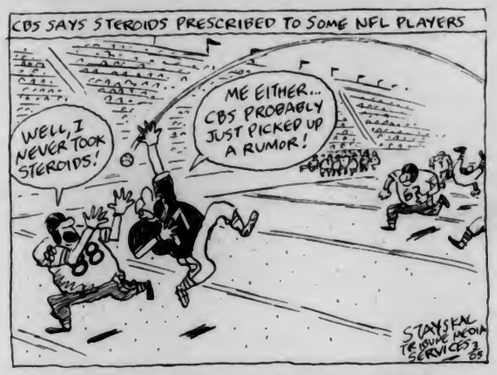
Jennings' absence will mark the end of an era

The network news broadcast industry has been drastically changed for everyone over the past six months. First, Tom Brokaw stepped down from his anchor post at NBC's news desk, followed promptly by Dan Rather leaving CBS. Now, Peter Jennings, ABC's nightly news anchor since 1965, has announced during his Tuesday night broadcast, that he has been diagnosed with lung cancer. This is truly the end of an era of great broadcast journalists, one that America will never see again.

In addition to the three major headliners, Ted Koppel, anchor of ABC's "Nightline," will also be stepping down, following Barbara Walters, who recently resigned as the host of ABC's "20/20." America has become so used to seeing the great broadcasters that these changes come as quite a shock.

Jennings, who will begin his chemotherapy treatment on Monday, has committed to stay on as anchor during his rehabilitation. The fact that he has decided to remain on the air shows his true dedication to his job and the American people who have come to rely on his broadcasts. Chemotherapy can be very taxing on a human's body, causing one to become very weak. Jennings' determination to get through this and his willingness to share his condition with the American people is a truly admirable quality, which just adds to the list of reasons why he is so important to American broadcast news.



Today's generation of young people grew up with Jennings and his contemporaries. They're our version of Walter Cronkite. In a time when society is changing and there are so many varying opinions and movements throughout the country, it is vitally important to have a wide array of broadcast journalists that can gain the American people's support and understanding. These anchors were able to gain the trust of the country at a time when trust is hard to win.

Jennings is asking his viewers to bear with him, as his voice will be hoarser from time to time during his broadcast. His broadcasts, because of him filming during his chemotherapy, will also prove to millions of Americans that it is possible to live and function in a stressful day-to-day job with cancer. Jennings will not only be a role model to cancer patients everywhere, but he will also be under the stressful eye of the nation during his turmoil.

At 66 years old, to undertake this task and have it followed through on his terms shows great determination, and a huge amount of respect is warranted to him from every one of his viewers.

Jennings is the last great nightly news anchor that Americans can look to with trust and admiration. He has the experience and he has the wherewithal to do what he does to perfection every night. It's not an easy job, regardless of how many years of broadcasting you have behind you. In the upcoming months, it will be imperative for the American public to give their support and understanding to Jennings, even more so than they do every night. He is truly the last of the greats and America should let him know that our hearts are with him.

An open invitation to Hilary

Matt Brochu

It's officially ok for me to start dating Hilary Duff. In case you haven't heard, she's a college girl now, cramming in a few online classes in her free time through the Harvard Extension School. Unfortunately, when she made this announcement on her Web site a month ago, she chose to omit the word "Extension" and in doing so implied that she went to the "real" Harvard. And let me tell you, the Harvard kids were wicked pissed.

Within days, the editorial staff of "The Crimson," Harvard's school newspaper, published an "Oh no you didn't, girl" editorial calling Duff a "loser and a chicken" because she wouldn't man-up and "live la vida Harvard" like the rest of the students. There was more to the letter, and there were parentheses all over the place, but I decided to respond by inviting Hilary to take classes at the University of Massachusetts instead.

Dear Hilary,

The Crimson Editorial Staff has spoken. You — chicken. Them — cool. It's really that simple. Withdraw from your (online) classes and pack your (virtual) bags, because everyone should care what their (substantially less famous) classmates think. Look, telling your fans you take classes at Harvard may not be a crime, but to these hardworking future pricks of America, it's pretty damn close. This may not make sense to an innocent (amazingly talented) girl like yourself, so I'll put this in terms you can understand.

Let's say your boyfriend, 26-year-old Joel Madden of Good (luck convincing the Duffs you aren't a pervert) Charlotte, decides to buy you some Louis Vuitton underwear. Later on you come to find out he bought them from a dude named Ray Ray manning a folding table in New York City who loves rainy days because "them umbrellas sell quicker than crack rock."

Now, not only do you feel stupid for telling your friends that the Louis Vuitton bras all over your breasts were real, but you've alienated the owners of real Louis merchandise all over the country in the process. Just imagine how poor little Daisy (Jessica Simpson's lapdog) feels when she takes a dump in her own personal LV carrier after your callous desecration of the brand name she trusts most. Now you know how the Harvard kids feel. I hope you're proud of yourself.

It's pretty evident that the Harvard student body doesn't want you. Who cares? Welcome to the club. It's called "Everybody," and we meet at the bar (blatant Drew Carey rip-off).

Let's not make a mountain out of a molehill. Almost 23,000 little dorks applied to Harvard this year. In terms of demographics, this crop includes a 28.3 percent increase in applications from African Americans, along with a 15.5 percent rise in applications from Hispanic Americans, and a shocking 47 percent increase in applications from National Spelling Bee participants with nervous ticks. Overall, 51 percent checked off the "Female" box (of these, 78 percent prefer Star Trek: Voyager over Star Trek: Deep Space Nine), and 49 percent checked off the "Male" box (of these, 91 percent have never touched a boob).

So what does this mean for the overwhelming majority of Harvard hopefuls? Over 20,000 of them received the dreaded thin envelope on March 31. Not that this is anything new. Each and every year, thousands of potential Harvard students are rejected (by members of the opposite sex), despite possessing numerous attributes that many (mathletes and present-day Urkels) would find attractive. This leaves you with one possible solution: screw Harvard and enroll at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

Face it, Harvard is so yesterday. UMass is so today. Sure, we may not have newfangled video lecture technology, but that's nothing a few autographed Lizzie McGuire posters couldn't fix. Besides, we could care less if you endure the authentic ZooMass experience. It's probably not in the best interests of your career to flash the crowd at Red Sox riots or get Taser'd by UMass Police at the annual Hobart Hoedown, anyway.

We (safety school rejects) are humble enough to appreciate each and every component of the Hilary Duff experience. Plus, you wouldn't have to play fourteenth celebrity fiddle to lesser talents like Mira Sorvino and Tatyana Ali, who have Ivy League street creds merely because they kicked it on campus with the commoners. At UMass, you'd immediately vault Bill Cosby (did his undergrad at Temple anyway) and Kina from MTV's "Road Rules" (much shorter in person) to become our primary celebrity spokesperson on all school-related matters.

You see, (blatant "Good Will Hunting" rip-off segue) the sad thing about a girl like you is in 50 years, you're going to start doing some thinking on your own and you're going to come up with the fact that there are two certainties in life: 1) You didn't need to go to Harvard, and 2) You dropped way-too-many grand on an education you could have gotten for the price of an internet connection, an affordable rate-per-credit, and a few Busch Light 30-packs (standard for each student).

So that leaves just one question to be asked: What size hoodie do you wear?

Hope to see you soon,
Matt Brochu,

Examining the alive, the dead and the line that divides them

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

This editorial has no real thesis in the advocational sense — that is, I will not be preaching any point of view or issuing a call to action. This is merely an article meant to discuss certain facts in this week's hot-topic current events in ways that many may not have considered. Perhaps this will enable my readers to reference these events with a fuller understanding of their position in the socio-political scheme of things, or maybe I'm just contributing to the heap of reiterated hype. Regardless, here goes.

To this point our beloved Collegian has been refreshingly devoid of editorials concerning either the over-sensationalized/over-politicized Terri Schiavo case or the passing of the pope. It has also been neglectful of the artificial life support question common to both of them. Nevertheless, I assume that we've all heard of Terri Schiavo, and I think it's safe to assume that we've also heard mention at one point or another over the years of Pope John Paul II. What we have not yet discovered en masse is a side of these issues that has been disturbingly neglected given its pertinence to the actors involved and the moral framing of the issues.

Three interesting discussions come to light: the late pope's view of artificial life support, Bush's association with artificial life support, and the federal government's relationship to the states.

What we have not yet discovered en masse is a side of these issues that has been disturbingly neglected given its pertinence to the actors involved and the moral farming of the issues

The first concerns the discussion of the morality of pulling Schiavo's feeding tube and whether or not this was murder tacitly supported by the state, the state mercifully allowing an incognizant woman to die, or something in between. Most of the protests to her passing were made along religious lines, and made by predominantly religious people. Thus, the issue has been painted as a typical "moral issue," similar to gay rights and abortion, in which the secular and the religious are at odds with one another. The untold story here is that in the weeks prior to his death Pope John Paul II declined a feeding tube to artificially prolong his life.

This doesn't seem so radical of a revelation, yet it does undermine our image of the discussion and of the conflicting sides and interests involved. If we are to assume that the only certainty in life is death, then artificially prolonging life constitutes "playing God" and removal or refusal of artificial life support does not. This is why John Paul II declined a feeding tube and why some religious groups might benefit from considering this individual case within the greater context of their general philosophies before vehemently opposing a "state acting as God."

Then there is the oft-ignored discussion of Bush's connection to life support. We all know that he and his brother pressed for the reinsertion of the feeding tube and that he even went so far as to sign abnormal legislation allowing federal courts to review a state issue — an incident that has raised more than a few eyebrows at the Supreme Court. What many remain unaware of is the legislation regarding artificial life support that Bush signed as governor of Texas. The fact that President Bush signed into law in Texas a bill — the Texas Futile Care Law — that gives health care providers the right to end human life according to local doctor judgment as well as patient inability to continue paying (see the case of Sun Hudson just a few weeks ago as well as that of Spiro Nikolouzos) is certainly important, especially given his decision to sign the Schiavo legislation and his rhetoric concerning a "presumption in favor of life." It also makes it ironic that he would favor federal meddling into the right of states to make and enforce their legislation in this area.

And it is this federal meddling in what are legally defined as state affairs that has most startled otherwise indifferent spectators of the Schiavo episode. First of all, why is this the Congressional discourse on healthcare instead of the achievement of universal healthcare or even fair insurance benefits? Second, how can the US Congress possibly convene and pass laws relating specifically to one woman? Is that not a trite and ideological abuse of individuals' powers as Senators and Representatives?

And finally, on what grounds did the government allow a state issue to suddenly be decided by federal courts simply because they disagreed with the state ruling? I don't recall anyone even scurrying to provide the flimsy justification that I would have expected. This is, again, a usurpation of governmental powers and it is curious that a federal appeals court should even consent to hearing the case at all. Dangerous legal precedents were quietly set as this case made its way through the various courtroom proceedings, even though the initial ruling was never overturned.

It appears that things are not as over-simplified as they seemed …

A day in the life …

Ben Feder

This is for all of you who want to know what it is like inside my mind from day's beginning to end.

Oh man, it's morning.

Oh boy, better wrap a towel around my waist.

That was a solid Lindsay Lohan dream last night.

OK, starting my day. Gotta get clean.

This shirt should get me action at the day's end.

Shampoo might help more though.

Damn, "Billy Madison" is funny.

Ok, time to dry off. This shirt won't get me anything. These pants might.

Shaving is cool. Why do girls complain about shaving their legs? I damn near rip my jugular every morning.

Boobs.

Jugular is a funny word, so is dynamite. I guess a lot of words are funny if you think about it. Dynamite.

I'm hungry. Need breakfast. Class in 20 minutes. I have lots of time. Need a sandwich.

Boobs.

Should I go to class? Yes. There are girls in class. It's so cold out. Damn, no girls in revealing clothing.

Boobs.

The elevator is the most impersonal place in the world; no two people who meet on an elevator will ever like each other. How tall is that guy? I want to be taller. Oh figures I get off the elevator and hot girls get on. I need a beer. Beer later. Get to class early and sit next to the girl you secretly love. Wait, which one is she again? The blonde? No, that's after lunch. Oh right, the red head.

This class is boring. Whoa, this kid next to me is falling asleep. He's bobbing his head. Oh, he's out. This class is really boring. This class has to be over soon. Forty-five minutes? Thank God that's over.

I need food. Sandwich. Eat. Swallow.

Boobs.

Hey, why don't I check everyone's away-messages on my buddy list? I have to use the bathroom. Number one or number two? I think I'll surprise myself.

When it comes right down to it, Jennifer Garner and Hilary Swank may very well be the ultimate threeway. Stop thinking about threeways. Concentrate on a twoway. Like lesbians? No, like you and a girl. I should be more honest with women. That cute girl down the hall used to like me I think. And I liked her. So why didn't I ask her out?

I wonder if football players ever soil themselves at the line of scrimmage.

Boobs.

Flush.

Back to the room. How did that Lucky Charms song go again? Hearts, clovers, stars, and rainbows? No, no. I think it was that. No, it had rainbows. I said rainbows. Rainbows, hearts, stars, clovers, balloons. "Balloons" is a funny word.

Class in ten minutes. Skip it. Play Madden. Isn't there a paper due? Tomorrow. I'll start it later. Madden first.

Phone is ringing. Maybe someone wants to have sex with you. No one who would call me would want to have sex with me. You never know. Damn, It's mom. Jesus, you were talking about sex with your mom. Shut up. Mom wants to know why I'm not in class. Tell her you're sick.

Stomach ache. What is this, First grade?

I wonder if my parents still have sex? Don't think about that. That's how people get warped. Dinner. Need food.

Boobs.

Cooking. Well, if you call throwing stuff in boiling water cooking. This is why people get married. Why? Your father cooks. True. I need to learn how to cook. Girls like guys who cook. I should work out more, too. I'll start running. Tomorrow. I'll also start learning to play that guitar I bought last summer. Doesn't it need a new string? The G-string I think. Hah, that's funny, "G-string." Wow. I need a girlfriend. Also, I need a beer.

Television and dinner were made for each other. What's on? Hmm, no one is home. "Desperate Housewives." Better make sure the "last channel" button is set to ESPN in case roommates come home. Truthfully, I do enjoy reading the articles in Playboy.

Bored. Might as well go to bed. Can't sleep. Formulate your top-100 girls-you-want-to-sleep-with list. 100: Nicole Kidman. 99: Blonde women from CSI. 98: This is dumb. I'm going on-line. Everyone is in bed or still out. How come I can't talk to the girls I see at bars. Their friends are always blocking guys. Sure, blame your own insecurities on other people.

You know, there really should be more representation of women in the math and science fields.

Maybe if I was taller I could talk to girls. Girls say size doesn't matter but we all know it does. Doesn't it? My stupid friends probably scared them off. I hang out with idiots.

Lie down with the lights off. Too bad there isn't anybody next to me. Too bad there isn't more than one person next to me. Stop thinking about threeways.

Boobs.

That's better.

Kinsey Sicks drag into FAC

By Michael A. Busack

UK Pianist quietly building an audience

By Shawn Price
The Orange County Register

LOS ANGELES — Matt Hales is about to be a real pop star. Maybe.

He's a dutiful pop star in training as he swigs a beer and fights a cold in a corner of L.A.'s Velvet Margarita. He just finished a gig across the street at the Hotel Cafe and is visibly ailing, but politely engages the mostly industry crowd that floats around him.

He's enduring this maybe part again, because he already knows what it's like to be done.

His first album, "Strange and Beautiful," under his nom de plume, Aqualung, arrived on these shores two weeks ago to critical acclaim after he built a following in Britain. But in 2002, he was a 30-year-old former prodigy whose band, the 45s, had broken up, its moment in the spotlight passed, its record contract evaporated and the future very bleak.

"It was pretty awful," he says. "You get accustomed to living on a knife edge when you're a musician. I really had to consider getting a real job. There are worse things, but my dream has always been to do this. So I did what any sane person without a job does, and called anybody that I had ever worked with to let them know I was available."

And then Hales says he took "this needle-in-a-haystack kind of thing."

A friend asked him if he had a song ready to use for a Volkswagen commercial. "I must have been number 102 on a list of 103 of people they called. I had one song, and I hadn't finished it."

He recorded the song "Strange and Beautiful" in his living room that night. It created such a storm of interest from Britons who tried to find it after hearing it on the commercial that it landed him a new contract.

The piano-driven, bittersweet pop confectionery of Hales' self-titled debut and its 2003 follow-up, "Still Life" spun off hits in Britain and eventually had U.S. filmmakers and TV producers swooning, too. Films like "Whicker Park" and TV's "Smallville," "Nip/Tuck" and "The O.C." have used his songs.

Hales has followed an unlikely path to success, one that has never been without music.

His parents owned a record and bookshop in Southampton, and Hales grew up absorbing everything he heard. Though a classically trained pianist who composed and performed his first symphony as a teen, the Beach Boys' "Pet Sounds," the Beatles' "Rubber Soul" and Stevie Wonder's "Songs in the Key of Life" had a huge effect on him, he says.

"I suppose it all mixes together inside. I can't untie it and tell what bits are what. People think that because of my training, I look at music intellectually. Music is something that comes from inside. All this stuff I know comes in handy, but it has nothing to do with the writing. There's a song that has a debt to Chopin but it had the sound that captured the feeling I had in myself. It's just a question of the language you use. You can't isolate yourself from your influences."

And he says his personal reinvention was a matter of simply following his gut.

"There was no design. I just knew that if something felt right, I wasn't gonna think twice. I'm just gonna trust it."

Despite the new batch of personal songs, Hales wanted a name, if not a real band, to shield himself, and chose the name Aqualung. However, he was unaware that people would confuse him somehow with Jethro Tull, which recorded the 1971 album "Aqualung." He admits to surprise and mild annoyance and insists there will be no one-legged flute solos.

"There's something in being called Matt Hales that might have limited it," he says. "And there's something nice in anonymity. In the end, you have your face and your name, and I wanted to keep them. The label suggested I change it, but I don't want to confuse everyone by changing my name to the Matt Hales Experience."

He's quite pleased with the word-of-mouth manner in which his music has caught on, and despite everything he's been though, he's still reluctant to be marketed too much by Columbia Records.

"When you cross a certain point in the mainstream, people will think, 'Oh, that's what everybody's buying so I'll buy it, too,' but people bought it because they really wanted it and that's nice. But if they happen to number several million that would be OK."

Eve violates a new zero-tolerance code

Original Sin

Eve

PART ONE:

I used to be that girl that always got away. The girl that could talk her way out of anything, charm anyone, and escape virtually any potentially negative situation that involved punishment. I wouldn't say I am a bad person; however, I have been known to be naughty from time to time.

When the events of last weekend unfolded, I couldn't help but wonder; why now? Out of all the times to be arrested, how could I be punished for this? My two friends and I had thought it would be a nice idea to have a cigarette while finishing our drinks on the steps of their house. In the midst of our upbeat conversation, a beige Toyota sped up onto the curb and screeched to a halt in front of the entrance.

"ID's please," two police officers ordered as they jumped swiftly out of the car.

We were stunned in disbelief. My friend jumped up and replied, "Sir, do you mind showing me your ID first?"

The man with the baseball hat flashed him what he didn't want to see.

"Amherst Police, we need ID's."

We rummaged through our bags, purses, wallets, breathing sighs of relief that we were all over age. The cops stood in front of us, unsure of what measures to take, until I decided to steer them in the right direction.

"Officers, please. We are very sorry for the offense. We were just having a cigarette, and our drinks are disguised properly. We are of age, please, we will spill them out and go back upstairs."

I flashed them a sweet smile and crossed my fingers. The officers looked hesitantly at each other until one of them noticed my two friends.

"Hey, don't we know you two?"

They stared back at the officers blankly and shrugged. The cop with the baseball hat nodded.

"Yup, these are the guys that we arrested two weeks ago for a noise violation." Our hearts sank. How did they remember that? I looked up at the officer and pleaded, "Sir, I don't have any previous offenses. Please let us go, we do apologize."

They had already made their decision.

"I'm sorry, we wouldn't normally do this, but Amherst has a new zero-tolerance policy. Please place your hands behind your back. You are under arrest."

Their policy made sense, but under arrest? That didn't make sense. I was dressed too nicely for the occasion.

As we waited handcuffed on the sidewalk for the police car to arrive, I felt an overwhelming feeling of helplessness. My heels were digging into my legs, my legs were scraping against the concrete ground, my nose was itchy, and worst of all, I had to pee.

"Officer, I really need to use the bathroom. Do you know how long this will take?"

He looked at me as if I was completely oblivious to the severity of the situation. But his eyes suddenly softened when he realized I really had to go.

"We'll be at the station shortly, okay? It won't be too long now."

He smiled kindly as he helped me up off the ground. I held my breath to hold back tears of frustration and self-pity. "Thanks," I replied.

I shook my legs out to revive the circulation, and clenched my jaw tightly as the cuffs dug deeper into my wrists.

"Ouch! Can you loosen these a little?"

Everyone laughed, and I was glad I could elevate the mood for the moment. We were transferred separately: my two friends in one car, me in the other. I stared out the window helplessly, watching other students enjoy their freedom without the thought that they too might one day be in the same situation.

The police car parked inside of a tightly surveillanced garage, and three other officers came out to escort us inside. One of them carefully took my arm and guided me to the entrance. I was tripping all over myself, I had little balance without my hands and my legs were trembling vigorously. I was placed in a single cell, my bladder on the verge of explosion, and my mouth parched by thirst. I noticed a single steel toilet, without toilet paper, in the corner. A camera pointed directly onto it, but there was nothing I could do to relieve the constant pain, for I was handcuffed.

Is this a sick joke, or what? I shook my head and crossed my legs tightly. This was going to be a very long night....

Hey guys, time to get in gear for Spring

By James H. Burnett III
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

For many American men, being told you do anything "like a girl" is considered an insult.

Throwing. Hitting. Running. You get the idea.

But fellas, if you haven't figured out yet what makes for a hot wardrobe, it's about time you learned to shop ... like a girl, or better yet, a woman.

While many women understand the concept of buying clothing, mixing and matching items to create multiple outfits, many men shop by mannequin, purchasing outfits that don't work with other clothes.

Following the plastic guy's lead is not always a bad thing if you're stumped, says our expert, Clinton Kelly, co-host of The Learning Channel's "What Not to Wear," the show that helps the hapless dress to fit their bodies and ages.

Kelly suggests you follow these tips:

Shop for pants first. "Start on the bottom. Generally men's trousers don't come in as many colors as women's. They tend to come in neutral colors, like black, charcoal gray, khaki. If you stick with neutral on the bottom, that's gonna make your life 100 percent easier, because with a neutral color as a foundation, you can wear something more colorful on top."

Look for neutral-colored pants with a little flair. "You can do a navy pant, a neutral color, with a pinstripe. . . . a lighter blue pinstripe, for example. You can take your cue from the pinstripe, and maybe wear a light blue sweater or shirt. You have to take your cues (for compiling outfits) from the garment itself. Maybe it's a windowpane pant with a little red in it. Look for a red shirt or sweater to match."

Buy business suits with mixing and matching already in mind. "The idea of breaking up a suit is so easy to do. Get a neutral suit; get it tailored to fit you. And simply take your cues and wear the pants with a nice colorful sweater. Take the jacket and wear it with nice jeans and a T-shirt."

See FASHION on page 8

One of this season's best trends is pairing a neutral suit top with some washed out jeans or wearing the pants with a colorful solid top. This look is easily attainable and wallet friendly.

Make your fabric patterns complement rather than clash with one another. "Women have a little more difficulty than men, because there's so much more color and pattern out there. They're more likely to buy something really colorful on the bottom and then have a tough time finding a good top to match. Guys have a tough time mixing and matching pattern, period. The thing for guys to learn is you want one pattern to be more dominant than the other. If you wear a pinstripe on the bottom, you can do a bold check on the top."

Be bright. "Every single designer showed bright colors (during New York's fashion week). I think aqua is a great color for guys, like a turquoise. It's a color most guys are really comfortable with and should try to wear in really bold solid shirts."

Go preppy. "Try something like a 'Great Gatsby' look, something like a cable-knit deep-V-neck sweater with contrasting trim."

Rough it. "A great denim blazer would also be good this spring, to sort of dress down a nice outfit from the top down. And then there is the safari-looking jacket with pockets on the front of the chest."

Air out your feet. "The average guy might not wear a sandal, but a safari-looking sandal, leather with lots of hardware, would be a good item."

Jazz up your jacket. "A favorite look of mine is pocket squares. They add a little bit of elegance, a little pizzazz to a sport coat."

Don't waist your midsection. "The bold belt buckle is continuing for men. Get yourself a nice thick belt and bold buckle for casual looks, in jeans, etc."

Cover your eyes. "The aviator sunglasses, not going away. It's such a classic look for guys.

Hilarious Amherst play a true original

By Jared Demick
Collegian Correspondent

Who would have thought that hell could be so much fun? That's exactly what the cast and crew of Amherst College's performance of "Three Days in Hell" managed to do for a couple hours on Saturday night.

The play was a wild, irreverent, and hilarious spectacle that mixed skilled comedic writing with finely tuned acting, keeping the audience laughing the whole time. Written by Amherst College student Jonathan Wemette, the play was a farcical take on the traditional Christian story of the three days that Jesus spent in hell between his crucifixion on Good Friday and his resurrection on Easter Sunday.

According to tradition, Jesus ventured into hell in order to save the souls of those who unfortunately were trapped there, which included the souls of such people as virtuous pagans. In Mr. Wemette's play, Jesus comes to hell in order to do just that, only there are some comedic complications.

In the beginning of the play, Satan, an irritable neurotic that makes Woody Allen look relaxed, has been planning a romantic evening with his secretary, Karen, who he's had a crush on for 500 years. However, God calls him and interrupts his plans with an unexpected surprise.

God tells him that his son, Jesus, has just been crucified and that he's coming to stay in hell for three days. Forced to cancel his dinner with Karen, Satan is enraged, but he has no choice but to concede to the Almighty.

Right after this, guests arrive on Satan's doorstep. However, they are not Jesus, they are Barnabas and Tryphon. According to tradition, these two men were thieves that were crucified along with Jesus; however, in the show, they are also Jesus' bag boys.

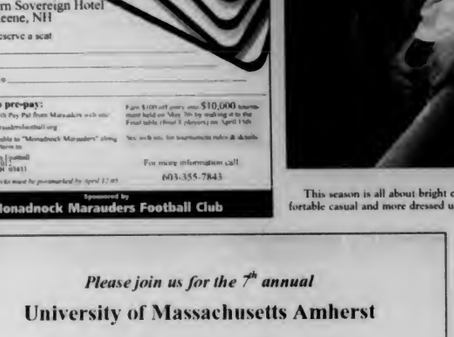
These two prove to be wonderful characters that constantly vex both Jesus and Satan as Barnabas is a long-winded talker who hatches ineffectual schemes, while Tryphon is highly reminiscent of Herman Munster. While waiting for Jesus to arrive, Barnabas and Tryphon get to know Satan and they begin to take an interest in his feelings for Karen.

Eventually, they hatch a plan to turn this neurotic basket-case into a charming man. Then Jesus arrives in all his flawless splendor, which the play wonderfully and irreverently renders as annoying. Meanwhile, Barnabas and Tryphon try to make Satan into a more presentable date. Jesus himself has an elaborate plan which involves taking people out of hell, but there is something fishy about it.

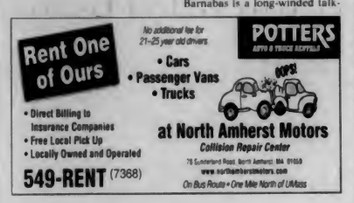
Barnabas, Tryphon, and Satan eventually find out what it is when they look in the bags that Jesus wants no one to touch. The bags contain lists of people who are going to be saved by God. However, the kicker is that God mandated that Tryphon must stay in hell while Barnabas and Karen go to heaven. In their panic, Barnabas and Tryphon hatch a plan to have Karen fall in love with Satan. This way, she will agree to stay, allowing a space to open up for Tryphon.

However, the plan is doomed from the start as Satan bumbles his way through the date creeping Karen out and infuriating her when she finds out that he is trying to hide the Messiah, her obsession, from her. Consequently, Karen joins the other saved souls and departs for heaven.

Barnabas, unable to endure the thought of spending an eternity away from Tryphon, decides to stay and this decision causes Jesus to have a comical meltdown.



The play ends on a whimsical note with Satan, Tryphon, and Barnabas learning to get along with one another.



This comedy was simply masterful. Mr. Wemette manages to be irreverent toward established religious icons and traditions, without being disrespectful. His play was a joy to watch as it managed to capture the best of comedies in the tradition of writers like Tom Stoppard while adding his own unique stamp. The play was full of witty lines and snippets of dialogue that subverted religious traditions by melding them to the techniques of the sitcom and the Hollywood buddy flick.

However, a great script cannot come to life unless it is handled by actors and a director who understand its nuances and strengths. Mr. Wetteman was fortunate to have such a wonderful cast perform his play. Each of the actors managed to inhabit their characters completely. One instantly thinks of John Timothy as Tryphon who somehow managed to not change his expression once in the course of the whole play. Sean George was great as Barnabas as he captured his character's use of exaggerated gestures. William Unsworth, in his performance as Jesus, simultaneously made his character seem flawless and annoying. Honora Talbot's turn as Karen revealed the forthright callousness resident in her character, a callousness that could only be matched by Brain Lewis's self-pitying, petty, and insecure Satan. Mr. Lewis managed to portray Satan as an insecure, deeply wounded person with a vast complexity of motivation. Such depth of portrayal in comedy is very rare.

All in all, Three Days in Hell was a surprisingly and consistently hilarious play, where great writing and great acting managed to come together and create something more than the sum of its parts. One gag followed another, and for a brief moment in time, hell, that place of eternal damnation, didn't seem so bad after all.

MLB salaries a record

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball's big-money boom pushed the average salary to a record $2.6 million on opening day, and the New York Yankees' payroll of just under $200 million topped five teams combined.

Following a rare drop in 2003, the average climbed 5.9 percent to $2.63 million, according to a study by The Associated Press.

"That means we're going in the right direction," San Francisco Giants outfielder Marquis Grissom said. "When they go up, it's always good."

Three Yankees were among the top five in salary: Alex Rodriguez, at $25.7 million, was No. 1 for the fifth straight year, Derek Jeter was fourth at $19.6 million and Mike Mussina was fifth at $19 million.

San Francisco's Barry Bonds, who started the season on the disabled list following knee surgery, was second at $22 million, followed by Boston's Manny Ramirez at $19.8 million.

While the players on the Yankees' opening-day roster totaled $205.9 million, cash received by New York in trades, notably last year's deal to acquire A-Rod from Texas, cut their payroll to $199.77 million.

"I'm just hoping that they'll let me in a card game or something around here," new Yankees pitcher Jaret Wright, who signed a $21 million, three-year contract, joked during spring training. "I don't know what the buy-ins might be, but I might have to take out some money out of my house or something."

New York is spending more than the $187 million total of Tampa Bay ($29.9 million), Kansas City ($36.9 million), Pittsburgh ($38.1 million), Milwaukee ($40.2 million) and Cleveland ($41.8 million).

"That doesn't mean we're going to go out and give up," Kansas City first baseman Mike Sweeney said. "We have talent and heart, and if you play with heart, you can win games."

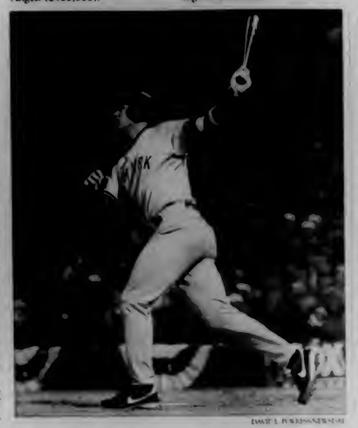
While the NFL and NBA have salary caps, baseball does not. The current labor contract expires after the 2006 season.

"Sometimes in baseball it's better being the underdog because you can sneak up on somebody," Pittsburgh outfielder Matt Lawton said. "It's been like this the last couple of years, but the deal's up in 2006 and, hopefully, we can get something done (to make it better) — but without a salary cap. Nobody wants that."

The World Series champion Boston Red Sox were second to the Yankees, with their players adding to $121.3 million. The New York Mets were next at $104.8 million, followed by Philadelphia ($95.3 million) and the Los Angeles Angels ($95 million).

While the Yankees have had the top payroll each year since 1999, they haven't won the World Series since 2000. Boston was second last year when it won its first World Series title since 1918. The 2003 champion Florida Marlins were 20th and the 2002 champion Angels were 16th.

"At times it can be frustrating. But there's nothing we can do," Tampa Bay outfielder Carl Crawford said. "We've just got to keep focusing on what we can do and go out and play."



Last year, the average salary wound up dropping 2.5 percent, the first decrease since the 1994-95 strike and only the third since record-keeping began in 1967.

Teams then committed $1.29 billion in major league contracts to 146 players who filed for free agency after the World Series, led by the New York Mets' $119 million, seven-year deal with Carlos Beltran. All that spending prompted Pirates owner Kevin McClatchy to say: "I don't know what happened, maybe they drank some funny water, but they all decided they were back on the binge."

McClatchy advocates a salary cap. The current system includes a luxury tax, and three teams paid last year: the Yankees ($25 million), Red Sox ($5.2 million) and Angels ($900,000).

"I think the playing field economically is better," commissioner Bud Selig said. "Certainly we have work to do, but it's better than it was 10 years ago. I look at places like Detroit, Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, and there's excitement everywhere."

After dropping for three straight years from 425 to 374, the number of players making $1 million rebounded to 390. The median salary, the point at which an equal amount of players is above and below, rose to $850,000 from $800,000, still below the 2001 high of $975,000.

Minutemen falter in ninth just didn't get it done," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We gave up four runs in the eighth inning. Everything is we."

The Minutemen (3-15 0-3 Atlantic 10) almost mounted a comeback in the eighth inning. After sophomore Michael Weiner popped out only a few feet from the fence, Garrity continued to get on base by finding the gap in right for a single, then advanced to second on a passed ball.

Rankin then sent a longball to center field, where O'Connell made a spectacular over-the-shoulder catch. As O'Connell threw the ball in, the Hartford bench screamed at shortstop Bill Perry to check second base to see if Garrity waited while attempting to tag up. Once Perry stepped on the bag, the umpire called Garrity and ended the inning. The call sent Stone flying out to the middle of the field to argue the call.

"I felt the umpire missed the call," Stone said. "Otherwise, I wouldn't have come out."

In the fourth with the score knotted at two, the Maroon and White jumped out to an early lead on the strength of a three-run rally. Catcher Bryan Garrity started things off by ripping a fastball on a 3-1 count down the left field line for a standup double. Rankin followed Garrity with a frozen rope to left field that Josh Topp bobbled, and the error allowed Garrity to scored uncontested.

As momentum started to build in UMass' favor, designated hitter Dan Coudy launched a long shot over the left-center wall for a two-run homer to extend the lead to 5-2.

"[The rally in the fourth] felt good throughout the whole game, except for the way it ended," Stone said.

Hartford nearly pulled off a triple play in the seventh inning. Senior Derrick Durepo's bunt was caught by a diving Pete Moraski, who also pitched three shutout innings to close out the win. Moraski quickly fired the ball to Perry at second, who nearly got senior Jason Twomley at first for the third out. The blown bunt was the second bunt turned into a double play on the day.

"You don't feel good about those things," Stone said. "We practiced a lot, expect to execute, and we didn't."

pitchers, and we really use that to our advantage."

"I think both of them keep getting better," Sortino said. "I think Jenna was extraordinary today. They both give us tremendous confidence. This is a good hitting team and to know that two or three runs are going to do it for us is a nice position for us because we're certainly capable of putting two or three runs up every time out there."

LaFogg got the start in the first game and picked up where she left off in her last home start. In her last outing at the UMass Softball Complex, LaFogg tossed a one hit shutout. Yesterday the senior hurler was almost as impressive, as she allowed only two hits and one unearned run.

LaFogg (9-7) flirted with a no-hitter through the first five innings, but surrendered two hits in the sixth. She relied on the strikeout to shutdown Maine, as she recorded 13 in the game to bring her A-10 leading total to 106.

UMass employed a balanced attack on offense, led by freshman Lauren Proctor who went 3-for-3 with an RBI and a run scored. Proctor extended her hitting streak to 13 games in the opener, but saw the streak come to an end when she went 0-for-3 in the second game.

In Game 2, UMass jumped out to an early lead, and Busa never let Maine get within striking distance.

In the first inning, senior Denise Denis drilled a line drive that deflected off of the Maine first baseman and into centerfield, scoring sophomore Candice Molinari from third.

Denis picked up her second and third RBIs of the game in the third when she doubled in senior Hillary Puglia and Molinari. Maine then brought Sarah Bennis in from the bullpen, and she silenced the UMass offense the rest of the way.

homer in the bottom half.

Mike Timlin (1-0) got two outs for the win. His first pitch hit Jeter in the left shoulder and then deflected off his head, knocking Jeter's helmet off and sending him sprawling to the dirt.

He remained in the game to run the bases, but was replaced at shortstop by Rey Sanchez in the ninth.

The Red Sox got a strong outing from knuckleballer Tim Wakefield, who allowed only three hits in 6 2-3 innings — including solo homers by Rodriguez and Martinez.

Making his first start of the year, Mike Mussina gave up nine hits but worked out of trouble all afternoon. Helped by three double plays, he limited the Red Sox to two runs in six innings.

With Kevin Brown on the disabled list, right now Mussina is the lone holdover from last year's rotation.

Kevin Millar's two-run single gave Boston the lead in the fourth.

Rodriguez homered to center in the bottom half, his first of the season. Martinez tied it at 2 when he connected in the fifth, his first since returning to the Yankees.

A fan favorite in New York while winning four World Series titles from 1996-01, Martinez got a huge ovation and popped out of the dugout for a curtain call.

NOTES: Millar left in the sixth inning with a cramp in his left leg. After going 3-for-3, he was replaced by David McCarty. ... The Red Sox have not been swept in a three-game series to start season since 1996 at Texas.

Tiger still the Master attraction

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. — Tiger Woods is still the main attraction at the Masters.

A half-dozen grown men were walking along the 11th fairway Wednesday morning when they scampered into the woods and huddled around a golf ball, gawking as though it were a meteorite that descended onto Augusta National.

They kneeled over and held their cameras inches from the ball — a swoosh on the right side and "TIGER" printed on the top — and clicked away. Other fans came over and started passing the men their cameras for more pictures.

And it was only a golf ball.

The guy who hit the tee shot some 50 yards off line — right of the trees, right of the gallery and into a small forest of Georgia pines — never showed up. A marshal eventually broke up the crowd and heaved the ball to Woods' caddie.

Woods is used to this kind of star treatment at Augusta National, where he shattered scoring records as a 21-year-old and already had three green jackets by the time he was 26.

But he no longer is the main event.

Phil Mickelson is the defending champion when the 69th Masters begins Thursday, and many believe he is primed to join Woods, Nick Faldo and Jack Nicklaus as the only back-to-back winners of a green jacket.

His victory Monday in the BellSouth Classic was his third of the year. And his confidence soars even higher just driving down Magnolia Lane, walking upstairs to the champions locker room, being on a golf course where a year ago he birdied five of the last seven holes to capture his first major.

"Being able to come through when I needed to gives me a little of extra confidence," Mickelson said.

Vijay Singh is No. 1 in the world, and has been for all but two weeks in March. And while his only victory this year came in the second week of the season, he is the only player who seems to be around the top of the leaderboard no matter where he plays.

"Vijay is the one that is playing the best at the moment," Sergio Garcia said.

Ernie Els is seeking redemption at Augusta National. Retief Goosen is seeking recognition. Those two South Africans, along with Mickelson and Singh, all have won majors in the nearly three years since Woods last captured a coveted Grand Slam event.

"If you look at guys who are at the top in the world ranking, and the guys who have won major championships, you know they can handle the heat," Woods said. "You know they're not going to make a mistake."

He hasn't had this much competition since winning the first of his eight majors at Augusta National in 1997.

On perhaps the most famous stage in golf, the latest battle begins to unfold Thursday with a Masters that is being billed more as a free-for-all than a heavyweight prize fight.

And while top players are getting most of the attention, another familiar theme threatened to intervene.

A line of violent thunderstorms began working its way toward Augusta National even as the undercard, the Par 3 Tournament, was being held Wednesday.

Weather already has interrupted play in eight of 14 tournaments, and one forecast said the course could get as much as an inch of rain about the time the Masters gets under way.

"See you Friday," Woods said jokingly as he left the course after a nine-hole practice round, knowing that his 1:33 p.m. starting time might be pushed back.

Perhaps the adage this year will be the Masters doesn't start until the back nine Monday.

If nothing else, rain figures to soften an Augusta National course that has been firm, fiery, fast and frightening, with players remarking they had never seen the greens this fast so early in the week.

That could be an advantage for the longer hitters, although accuracy is underrated at the Masters. And to see Woods send his tee shot on the 11th hole so far to the right only raises more questions about his game.

No one doubts he can win because he is the best at limiting his mistakes, and because he already has won twice on the PGA Tour this year, including a stirring rally to beat Mickelson at Doral.

But which Woods will show up?

One week he looks like a world beater.

UM sweeps double dip

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

After dropping two games at Fordham on Monday, the Massachusetts softball team got back on the winning track by sweeping Maine yesterday in a double-header at home. UMass won the first game 5-1 and took the second game 3-0.

UMass (13-11-1 2-2 Atlantic 10) will be back in action on Saturday when it hosts George Washington for a doubleheader beginning at noon.

The losses to Fordham, which marked the first time UMass had ever lost to Fordham in 23 meetings, were still very much in the minds of the UMass players and coaching staff when they took the field against Maine.

"I think the Fordham game caused us to look at some things and the way we're executing," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "It was sort of a blessing in disguise. The kids responded really well in practice with the adjustments that needed to be made, and obviously they paid off today."

"We were very upset with the Fordham game," junior pitcher Jenna Busa said. "When a team that we know we can dominate beats us, we were like 'a pissed off tiger' as our coach would say. Today Barb [LaFogg] and I were furious enough to take it to them."

Busa and LaFogg took out their frustrations from Fordham on Maine yesterday, as the two pitchers combined to allow only one unearned run and three hits in the two games. The duo also combined for 22 strikeouts.

"It's a lot of fun when we can both play off each other," LaFogg said. "We're different types of

Minutewomen use speed as weapon

By Eric Atlas
Collegian Staff

Solid batting, pitching and fielding are all valuable assets to any softball team, but one facet of the game that the Massachusetts softball team has been honing in on is speed. The idea of quickness may not seem like a genius idea at first, but the results show that UMass coach Elaine Sortino's strategy has been effective.

How fast a team is and how it utilizes that speed is directly correlated with how well a team steals and bunts. In the first half of yesterday's double-header against Maine, sophomore Candice Molinari was an example of how Sortino is emphasizing the running game. In the first inning, Molinari hit a dribbler to second base that went from an average ground out to a single — purely because of speed.

Molinari went on to steal two bases in Game 2 and also advanced to first base on a bunt to the pitcher. After yesterday's games, Molinari is tied for first in the Atlantic 10 for stolen bases with 15 and has yet to fail an attempt.

As a team this season, the Maroon and White have proven that utilizing speed and stealing bases is something that can change the outcome of a game. In the 13 wins accumulated by UMass this season, the team stole a total of 25 bases; in the 11 losses — eight. Others who have been effective stealing this season are senior Hillary Puglia (five) and freshman Lauren Proctor (four). Along with the starters who have put up the numbers, Sortino has also been utilizing the act of substitution as a way to exercise the speed on the team. After junior KJ Kelley had to nurse an ankle injury two weeks ago, Sortino would often replace her with pinch runners such as freshman Sarah Hurd and sophomore Michea Holness.

The other aspect of the game of softball that requires speed is bunting. While bunting is a technique that is intended to advance runners, it is a bonus for the team if the person bunting is fast enough to make it to first base. Molinari leads the team with six bunts on the season, including one in Game 1 yesterday.

Fielding is another part of the game that requires a certain amount of speed. In yesterday's Game 1, specifically, there were two plays that displayed the players' ability to field the ball. With one out in the fifth and LaFogg pitching four hitless innings, Maine rolled out back-to-back line drives to left field and right field that came close to becoming homeruns.

Senior Denise Denis and Molinari snagged those balls, closing out any hopes of a possible run in the fifth inning. Molinari leads the team with a perfect fielding percentage on the season.

While it may seem like a necessity for a softball team to attain players who are exceptional at the plate, Sortino looks for versatility rather than focusing in one specific area of the game.

Denis may not appear like someone who can power the ball out of the park, standing at 5-foot-5 and boasting blazing speed, but her four homeruns on the season are tied for the team high. Denis had two hits and three RBI in yesterday's wins. Sortino stresses that her team is skilled and able at every position and that the confidence level of the team as an entirety is high.

Another victory

Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team just keeps rolling along.

Yesterday the team improved its record to 12-6 overall and a perfect 4-0 in Atlantic 10 play with a 7-0 defeat of Fordham (10-5 3-1 A-10).

The complete sweep of Fordham marks two shutouts in a row for the Minutewomen. On March 30 they blanked Rhode Island by a score of 7-0. The win extends UMass' winning streak to five matches.

Also for the second consecutive match, UMass was able to beat all of their singles opponents in straight sets. Fordham, however, did put up a much bigger fight than URI. Of the six singles matches, three could have easily gone Fordham's way.

"The team is very confident right now," UMass assistant coach Celeste Frey said. "Sasha [Edelstein] pointed out to the team that we have never beaten Fordham 7-0."

Senior captain Sasha Edelstein was able lock up her match at No. 3 by a score of 6-1, 6-4.

UMass star sophomore Michele Spiess won her match at No. 1 6-4, 6-0. The first set between Spiess and Rams freshman Ellenoira Featherston was very close as the two battled back and forth. Spiess turned it up in the second set dominating Featherston the whole time. Spiess had her on her toes the entire match and Featherston was visibly fatigued towards the end.

Picking up wins at No. 2 and No. 4 for the

ANDY TAMULYNAS/COLLEGIAN

Dorothy Iwanowicz won both of her matches yesterday. The Minutewomen shut out Fordham, 7-0.

ANDY TAMULYNAS/COLLEGIAN

The UMass women's tennis team has won its last five matches, shutting out its last two opponents.

Maroon and White were freshman Masha Pozar and junior Dorothy Iwanowicz. Pozar beat junior Christina Papa 6-2, 6-1. Iwanowicz downed sophomore Lisa Vulin 6-4, 6-3 in the closest match of the day.

Before the match UMass head coach Judy Dixon mentioned that the No. 5 and No. 6 slots in the lineup needed to step up and perform better. Junior Susan Johnson and junior Jana Bartoloni both did exactly that.

Johnson defeated fellow junior Danielle Spigner 6-3 6-0. Frey commented that it was a big match for Johnson because Spigner played in the No. 3 spot for the Rams last season.

In the No. 6 hole, Bartoloni took care of junior Elizabeth Murray in straight sets 6-1, 6-3.

"We're working harder with them and focusing on those two," Frey said. "Susan is playing much better and Jana is definitely stepping up again."

The Minutewomen were able to pick up the doubles point for the seventh straight match dating back to March 14 when they defeated Tennessee-Chattanooga.

None of the doubles pairings gave up more than two points to Fordham. The team of Johnson and Iwanowicz outmatched Featherston and Papa by a score of 8-2 in the No. 1 slot. The duo of Pozar and Spiess picked up the win at No. 2 also by a count of 8-2.

Rounding out the doubles competition were Edelstein and Bartoloni, who won by a landslide, 8-1.

With the win over another A-10 foe, UMass should enjoy a favorable seed in the conference tournament in College Park, Maryland on April 22-24. Dixon and Frey have, however, warned their team about not getting too over confident.

"We've been talking to the team and telling them that any A-10 match can go either way," Frey said. "Yes, we've won, but, a lot of them have been by one point."

UMass collapses late

Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team put its highest run total of season on the board yesterday, but Hartford senior Luke Trahan's two-run shot in the top of the eighth inning sealed a 7-6 win for the Hawks at Earl Lorden Field.

UMass	6

ANDY TAMULYNAS/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore infielder Bryan Adamski had one hit and one RBI in UMass' loss to Hartford yesterday.

After cutting the lead to one run, Trahan took a change-up from UMass pitcher Scott McGovern over the left field fence to take the lead and eventually the game. Trahan drove in three of Hartford's seven runs while going 2-for-4 with two runs scored.

"It feels good," said Trahan about his game-winning shot. "We have been struggling lately, and I have been struggling at plate recently.

"I knew he was going to throw me something off speed. The last four pitches he threw me were all off speed, and I just waited back on it. It's good momentum before we start conference play next week."

Down 6-3, Hawks third baseman Adam Bowster sparked the winning rally with a single up the middle. In the next at-bat, first baseman John Cuscovitch smashed a double into the left field corner, and Bowster easily scored from first, cutting the lead to 6-4.

Catcher Mike Crowley responded with another single up the middle, and he was replaced by pinch-runner Matt O'Connell. With runners on the corners, second baseman Frank Cipolla grounded out to Anthony Santos, but Cuscovitch managed to score from third.

This got the Hawks (2-7) within one before Trahan ripped his game-winning two-run homerun..

Sox overcome Rivera

By Mike Fitzpatrick
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Mariano Rivera let another lead slip away against Boston. Alex Rodriguez made a costly error, too, and this time the Yankees couldn't recover.

Playing without ailing manager Terry Francona, the Red Sox rallied for five runs against Rivera in the ninth inning and beat New York 7-3 Wednesday to avoid a season-opening sweep.

Francona was taken to a hospital in the morning with tightness in his chest. He was resting there comfortably awaiting test results, the team said during the game. Bench coach Brad Mills filled in for Francona.

"We've been talking to the team and telling them that any A-10 match can go either way," Frey said. "Yes, we've won, but, a lot of them have been by one point."

The teams play three more games next week at Fenway Park beginning with Boston's home opener Monday, when the Red Sox will receive their World Series rings.

Rodriguez and Tino Martinez homered for the Yankees, who went ahead in the eighth without a hit. Gary Sheffield drove in the tiebreaking run with a sacrifice fly.

Rivera entered in the ninth with a 3-2 lead for the second consecutive day, and blew it again. He issued a leadoff walk to Bill Mueller before consecutive singles by Mark Bellhorn and Johnny Damon loaded the bases with none out.

After Trot Nixon struck out, Manny Ramirez hit a routine grounder to Rodriguez at third. He should have been able to get at least a force play at the plate and possibly a game-ending double play, but he hobbled the ball and the tying run scored.

David Ortiz drove in the go-ahead run with a dribbler to the right side, and Edgar Renteria made it 6-3 with a two-run single.

Rivera was lifted after walking Doug Mirabelli and walked off the mound to a smattering of boos. The final run scored on Felix Rodriguez's wild pitch.

Rivera allowed five runs _ one earned _ and three walks in two-thirds of an inning. He also gave up three hits.

The All-Star closer has blown his last four save chances against the Red Sox, including two in the 2004 playoffs, and six opportunities in all since the start of last season.

He yielded Jason Varitek's tying homer in the ninth on Tuesday, but Jeter bailed out Rivera with a game-winning Antiwar Coalition holds talk about 'back door draft'

By Leia Hlustick
Collegian Correspondent

A former Texas National Guardsman and a military counter-recruitment activist spoke out against the United States military's "back door draft" at the "What is the Back Door Draft?" event, sponsored by the UMass Antiwar Coalition at the University of Massachusetts on March 30.

Carl Webb, the Texas National Guardsman, has been involved with the military since 1982, according to his Web site, carlwebb.net. After years away from active duty, he re-enlisted in August 2001, which he said was "very bad timing."

His three-year contract was to end in August 2004. However, in July 2004, he says his contract was nullified under the military's "Stop Loss Program," and his term of service was extended against his will.

When Webb says he was notified that he would be sent to fight in Iraq, he made the decision to refuse, although it meant that he could face up to five years in prison. He stressed that his main concern is not the "involuntarily extended service" of the Stop Loss program, but the war in Iraq.

"I would still be opposed to this war even if I was under contract," he said. "I refuse to participate in a war based on greed."

Webb criticized some parts of the anti-war movement for emphasizing the message of "support our troops" and for conventional protest tactics.

"I'm more concerned that 100,000 Iraqis have died in the last two years, and one million Iraqis have died since 1991, which is when this war really started," he said.

The speaker stressed that he is not a pacifist, and would fight for a cause that he believed was just.

"If I was a Jew in Europe in World War II, or a slave in the antebellum days, or a Native American resisting colonialism, I would have used violence," he said.

The second speaker, Millie Guzman, is the military counter-recruitment officer who works with Latinos Contra La Guerra (Latinos Against the War) in Hartford. She argued that military recruiters use lies and deception to trick high school students, especially those who are working class, black or Latino students, into joining the military.

"The recruiters don't tell people about things like Stop Loss," Guzman said.

Guzman argued that the military is not a friendly place for women and racial minorities, claiming that three quarters of Blacks and 61 percent of Latinos experience racism in the military, while the large majority of women recruits experience sexual harassment, and one in three is raped. She added that while 30 percent of enlisted soldiers in the military are minorities, only 16 percent of officers are, adding that one third of all homeless people are veterans.

"There isn't much room for advancement," she said.

Both speakers stressed that Bush's "No Child Left Behind Act" ties school funding to disclosure of students' personal information to military recruiters. The recruiters can then use this information to craft personal pitches to students.

Guzman stressed that parents can request that their child's information be withheld from the military, but that schools often do not make parents aware of this.

"The information can be contained in one sentence, in fine print, at the back of a 200 page student handbook," she said. She added that a lot of the work that her organization does is educating students about their rights, including their right to not have their information given to recruiters, and the right to refuse to take military placement tests.

Both speakers believed that a draft will be announced very soon, possibly in the next few days, and will be put into effect this summer.

In response to a question from the audience, the speakers suggested that while the military does provide job training, people had the right to job trainings without having to kill or die.

"The military shouldn't be a job training program," Guzman said. "The money being spent on the war would be better spent on education, job training and social services."

Pastor pleads not guilty to swindling millions in scam

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — A Baptist pastor pleaded not guilty Thursday in federal court to swindling $1.5 million from lenders and home buyers in a real estate scam.

The Rev. Paul J. Starnes, 39, leader of the Morning Star Church in Springfield, was released on $25,000 unsecured bond by U.S. District Court Magistrate Kenneth Neiman and ordered to return to court on June 1. His lawyer, Kevin Murphy, would not comment on the case.

David McCoy, 42, pleaded innocent to similar charges earlier this week and was also released on a $25,000 unsecured bond.

A third man indicted in the alleged scheme, Marc Brown, 45, also pleaded innocent and was released Thursday on the same conditions as his co-defendants. His lawyer, Charles Groce, did not immediately return a telephone call to The Associated Press.

The men, who all face money laundering and wire fraud charges, are accused of conspiring in a land-flip scheme. The practice typically involves buying depressed properties, paying off appraisers to inflate their values, recruiting poor, first-time buyers and drafting phony financial documents to obtain mortgages. While people involved in the deals see a profit, the new homeowners often default on the mortgages.

Federal authorities say the buyers were promised money back at the closings, or repairs on the homes that never happened.

Falling debris in I-93 tunnel causes change in contractors

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Turnpike officials are suspending all work directly above the Big Dig tunnels by the contractor responsible for Tuesday's construction gaffe that sent dirt and gravel raining down on traffic.

Turnpike Chairman Matthew Amorello called the gravel glitch "simply unacceptable" and said Modern Continental Co. will be barred from doing any more work above the tunnels until Big Dig officials can review the company's protocols to make sure all future work is carried out in a safe manner. Turnpike officials said the company will still continue road surfacing and other types of construction work that did not cause Tuesday's problem.

"It is up to Big Dig contractors to perform their work in a way that doesn't affect public safety," Amorello said in a statement Wednesday. "I have ordered project officials to review how Modern Continental's work is being handled to make sure we don't have another incident like Tuesday's."

Modern Continental issued a written statement Wednesday saying the company is "committed to maintaining the highest standard of safety on our work sites." The company said it anticipated a speedy return to work above the tunnel.

"We immediately initiated a comprehensive investigation in cooperation with the subcontractor and determined that it was an isolated incident and have taken corrective measures to ensure that it does not happen again," the statement said.

The debris fell from an overhead air shaft in the rehabbed Dewey Square tunnel, which serves as the southbound Interstate 93 tunnel, sometime after 11 a.m. on Tuesday, forcing the temporary shutdown of two lanes of traffic.

New Iraqi president takes oath of office

By Tract Carl
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Cementing Iraq's first democratic government in 50 years, one of Saddam's Hussein's most implacable enemies took his oath as president Thursday and quickly named another longtime foe of the ousted dictator to the powerful post of prime minister.

The new government's main task will be to draft a permanent constitution and lay the groundwork for elections in December, although some worry that the two months of political wrangling taken up in forming the leadership hasn't left enough time.

The swearing-in ceremony came just two days short of the second anniversary of Baghdad's fall to U.S.-led forces and underlined the growing power and cooperation of the Shiite Arab majority and Kurdish minority — groups that were long oppressed by Saddam's regime.

There were stumbles, though.

After his inaugural speech, interim President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, walked off the stage, and members of the National Assembly and onlookers began to disperse and television feeds were cut.

Talabani came back about 10 minutes later and had to shout to a dwindling crowd that the President's Council — Talabani and his two vice presidents — had, as expected, selected Shiite Arab leader Ibrahim al-Jaafari as interim prime minister.

Senior Kurdish official Barham Salch blamed the misstep on miscommunication, saying lawmakers didn't realize the ceremony hadn't ended with Talabani's speech.

Some Shiite lawmakers felt snubbed.

"We hope that they forgot," said Abbas Hassan Mousa al-Bayati, a top member of al-Jafaari's Shiite-dominated United Iraqi Alliance. "This happened because of bad management."

Al-Jaafari didn't seem upset, telling reporters afterward: "This day represents a democratic process and a step forward."

"I'm faced with a big responsibility, and I pray to God that everyone will work hand-in-hand and that their efforts will lead to progress and development," he added.

Fallout in Boston chancellor search

BOSTON (AP) — Two members of the search committee charged with hiring a new chancellor at the University of Massachusetts-Boston have resigned, saying confidential information about candidates and committee deliberations had been leaked to the public.

"I am outraged that the process has been subverted by a massive breach of confidentiality," UMass-Boston economic professor Mary Stevenson wrote in a resignation letter to UMass president Jack Wilson.

"The ensuing politicization of the process and the ways in which the committee's work has been undermined has, in my view, done great damage to the University," she wrote.

Stevenson and Dennis Austin, a trustee for the five-campus university system and a UMass-Boston alumnus, left the committee's final meeting in protest on Friday before the vote on the three finalists.

The finalists are Michael F. Collins, a Tufts Medical School professor and former head of Caritas Christi Health Care; Marvin Krislov, general counsel at the University of Michigan, and J. Keith Motley, the interim chancellor and its first black leader.

Wilson is expected to recommend one of the three to the board of trustees next month.

Although each member of the search committee signed a confidentiality pledge, the names of some candidates, including Collins, circulated before Friday's vote.

Austin told The Boston Globe on Wednesday that his resignation from the committee was meant as a statement about the failure to protect candidates.

New AIDS drug could help babies born to infected mothers

By John Solomon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Controversial U.S. research in Africa that violated federal patient protection rules was nevertheless conducted well enough to support its conclusions that the AIDS drug nevirapine could be used safely to protect babies, an expert scientific panel has concluded.

"The committee finds that there is no reason based in ethical concerns about the design or implementation of the study that would justify excluding its findings from use in scientific and policy deliberations," the Institute of Medicine panel said in a report first obtained by The Associated Press.

The report, released Thursday, will have implications in both Africa, where medical officials are debating whether to withdraw the drug, and in the United States, where investigators are examining whether U.S. research is complying with federal law.

The report was be welcomed as good news at the National Institutes of Health, the federal agency that funded the nevirapine study in Uganda and which has been engulfed in months of controversy but has insisted the drug is safe.

"NIH expects that the findings by the IOM will restore confidence in the validity of the conclusions of this study, allow the controversy surrounding the issue to subside and facilitate policy decisions that seek to promote the health of newborns at risk of HIV infection," the agency said in a statement.

caused minor damage to three cars and an ambulance, came from the air shaft that connected to an aboveground tunnel vent that contractor Modern Continental Construction has been demolishing.

A spokeswoman for the Turnpike Authority said two lanes were shut down to investigate the problem, and then reopened them within minutes when it became apparent there were would be no further debris to follow.

Modern Continental issued a statement Tuesday apologizing for the incident, and emphasizing that the dislodged debris had nothing to do with the structural integrity of the tunnel.

The incident came the day after the Federal Highway Administration released a report saying that the project "is structurally sound and remains safe for traffic."

Turnpike officials emphasized that the falling debris was a demolition issue, not a construction issues.

Drop the Debt

Ethan Burke

The 19,000 people who die each day from poverty-related diseases pass on without much notice from people who live comfortably in America. We would rather look away thinking, 'America cannot solve the problems of the world. We have our own problems.' We must face the hard reality that our government is not just failing to address the plight of the poor, but is actively supporting policies that cause impoverishment and misery.

Far from aiding poor countries, wealthy countries and the international financial institutions, they control drain resources from poor countries in the form of debt collection. Contrary to popular belief, the net flow of money is from poor to rich. For example, on average, Africans pay $1.51 in debt service for every $1 they receive in aid. The current system resembles a new form of colonialism where the poor are being exploited to further enrich powerful countries.

The debt crisis began in the period of decolonization in the decades following World War II. During the 1960s and 70s, leaders of developing nations were encouraged to borrow vast sums of money from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund foreign nations and private creditors. Rising interest rates in the 80s caused debts to skyrocket and poor nations are now saddled with unpayable debts spiraling out of control.

Debt has become a new form of bondage where unborn children inherit a legacy of exploitation making survival a challenge never mind prosperity.

One reason to drop the debt is that it has already been paid. The enormous Third World debt is the result of compounding interest. The principle loan has been repaid several times over. Nigeria is one extreme example where the original loan was $5 billion; Nigeria has paid back more than $16 billion, but still owes $37 billion. Nigerians have seen the rate of poverty rise to seventy percent while they continue to pay back wealthy creditors.

What's more, those who must bear the debt burden did not receive loans. Funds from loans were mostly sent right back to G7 countries by purchasing military equipment, importing foreign goods and contracting multinationals for large development projects. The beneficiaries are big corporations, a tiny collaborating class within the developing country, and corrupt leaders who often become fabulously rich. Wealthy nations that dominate international financial institutions encouraged lending to regimes such as Saddam Hussein in Iraq, General Suharto in Indonesia and the racist apartheid government in South Africa knowing funds would be spent on palaces, private jets, torture and repression. In a situation that would be funny if it weren't so grotesque, people must now pay for their own oppression, with interest.

Even nations that have faithful leaders seeking to lift their country out of poverty are trapped within the system. Highly indebted countries with sinking economies have little choice but to turn to the IMF for relief. The IMF loans come with conditions attached as part of structural adjustment programs. SAP's generally demand lower barriers to trade, devaluation of currencies, privatization of state owned industries, wage restrictions and worst of all cuts social spending.

Surrendering a nation's economy to private firms and cutting social spending has increased poverty and further indebted the poor. Corporations are in paradise being invited to exploit natural resources, employ cheap labor, and purchase state owned industries, often at incredibly undervalued prices.

Rather then promising more aid for development, simply canceling the debt will allow nations to access their own resources. It is estimated that between $7.5 and $15 billion is needed annually to fight HIV/AIDS in Africa while Africa pays out $13.5 billion in debt service every year— handicapping the HIV/AIDS battle at the beginning. Every African nation spends more on debt payments than on healthcare. Governments have had to impose fees for primary education causing enrollment to decline to 50 percent for children six to 11 years old in sub-Saharan Africa. Former Tanzanian president Julius Nyerere asked, "Must we starve our children to pay our debts?"

There are signs of hope. When pressing other nations to forgive Iraq's odious debt and help pay for reconstruction, President Bush voiced support for canceling third world debt. Several US Congressmen have re-introduced the JUBILEE Act prescribing 100 percent debt cancellation for fifty nations without conditions attached.

Debt has become a new form of bondage where unborn children inherit a legacy of exploitation making survival a challenge never mind prosperity. Our true power to change the world lies in our ability to influence policies at home. Change is within our reach and to fail to act is to accept one's role in the perpetuation of world poverty and suffering.

'Losing My Religion'

Erin McNamee

A funny thing happened while I was watching the news coverage of Pope John Paul II's illness and death: I finally realized why he was such an influential leader, both to Catholics and to the rest of the world.

Having been raised as a Catholic, I wondered why I didn't already know more about the Pope. Moreover, why wasn't I more appreciative of this man for whom millions of people the world over are mourning? And most importantly, why were some of my friends saying things such as, "What's the big deal?" or "He was old and ill — did these people expect him to live forever?"

These statements may sound crass and insensitive to devout Catholics or older generations, but to my generation they are valid questions.

As CNN news anchor Aaron Brown repeatedly pointed out during the network's relentless coverage of the Pope's life and death, most young people aren't old enough to be cognizant of the impact the Pope had on the world in terms of his humanitarian and peace-making efforts. While he was extremely conservative in terms of Catholic doctrinal matters (among other things, he opposed abortion, the ordination of women, stem-cell research and same-sex relationships), the Pope was a beacon of hope to many in a world ravaged by war, hate and hunger.

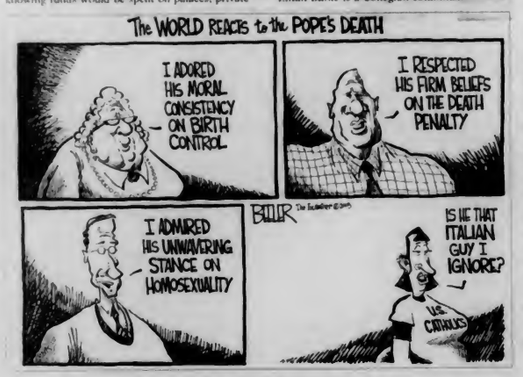
Archbishop Sean P. O'Malley of Boston, a close friend of the Pope, summed up the Pope's legacy best. "Pope John Paul II was not only the vicar of Christ on earth, but also a world leader who changed the course of modern history. In the Pope's dedicated mission of sharing the good news of Jesus Christ, he exhibited great love for youth and the poor and was untiring in promoting social justice, the family and the gospel of life. Our lives, and our world, are forever changed for the better because of the Holy Father's vision and his passionate commitment to the truth and human dignity."

Rev. Richard P. McBrien of the University of Notre Dame points to the Pope's liberal side: "John Paul II was a strong liberal on immigration, war and peace, social justice and human rights, and if the next Pope is at least as socially progressive as John Paul II, that will be a plus."

Although at the time I did not grasp the enormity of the historical events unfolding around me as the Pope grew gravely ill and eventually passed away, I found myself drawn to the television for much of last weekend. I became fascinated by the stories of his youth, his life-long friends, and the many ways he served the world's people, Catholic or not.

I'm not sure if I'll ever go back to being a Catholic again, but I do miss the core of Catholicism ... And if there's one thing that I think made Pope John Paul II great, it's the way he beautifully embodied these ideals.

But one story in particular stands out in my mind that I think reveals the essence of Pope John Paul II. On May 13, 1981, the Pope was shot in the abdomen in St. Peter's Square. He nearly died from the wound, yet not only did he publicly forgive his would-be assassin, the Pope actually visited the man in prison.



This story made me realize what I miss about the Catholic religion: the emphasis on forgiveness. As a lapsed Catholic, I've been thinking a lot about faith and religion recently. I remember the days when my life was practically shaped around religion — CCD classes, church every Sunday, the pomp and circumstance of various sacraments and even altar serving. Now, the only thing I do that's remotely spiritual is pray.

I blindly accepted the religion I was born into until I began forming my own moral and political beliefs. Suddenly the Catholic Church seemed like a hypocritical, antiquated organization. How could I invest in the Church's teachings that every individual is a child of God when the Church itself regularly discriminates against certain groups of people? And once the sex abuse scandal emerged, I felt like I was compromising my dignity by supporting an organization that went against my beliefs.

I'm not sure if I'll ever go back to being a Catholic again, but I do miss the core of Catholicism, which is the emphasis on forgiveness and prayer. And if there's one thing that I think made Pope John Paul II great, it's the way he beautifully embodied these ideals. While I may not have agreed with everything the Pope stood for, I understand the feelings of sadness over his passing. I can only hope that the next Pope will be able to find a balance between modernizing the Catholic Church and continuing the precedent of kindness and care for the world's people set by Pope John Paul II.

Campaign only makes things worse

Lisa McLaughlin

"Road Respect." It sounds good, doesn't it? Everyone could use a little more respect on the road. Respect for pedestrians. Respect for seatbelts. Respect for the designated driver. Respect for the right-of-way. Respect for the authority of police.

As many of you have heard, the "Road Respect" campaign was recently initiated by the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau. The GHSB allocated $500,000 in federal grant funds to state and local police for extra traffic enforcement in Massachusetts in hopes to curtail aggressive driving.

The campaign began on April 4 and will continue through April 17. The Amherst Police Department is using the $12,000 they received from the GHSB to activate 20 extra police officers to work shifts covering only traffic violations. Apparently, pigs fly and there's aggressive driving in Amherst. Give me a break. If anything, the drivers here are too polite. My advice is to be cautious this week, good drivers. We all know that locally, this campaign is set to target college students because we're a bunch of delinquents whose pockets aren't empty enough already.

Personally, I am very grateful that I don't have a car at UMass. I can deal with the free, minor inconveniences of waiting for the bus or walking 20 minutes to and from campus. Otherwise, like many of my friends, I would constantly be robbed by parking tickets and towing fees. Not to mention having to pay $150 a year to park my car in the unpaved, yellow-sticker, sorry excuses for parking lots. Add that, on top of the quarter meters that charge a dollar an hour, with a limit of two hours (one could write a book on the wrong-doings of parking services alone). Thanks, but no thanks. I'd rather spend my money on oh ... groceries. And rent. And maybe textbooks.

It's no lie that Massachusetts drivers can be real jerks, though. Here is a classic example. One day I was walking home from high school and it was pouring out. I had no umbrella, and no hood. I had to cross a busy street on my journey, where there were several very obvious, freshly-painted crosswalks. That day, I waited at a crosswalk and must have watched more then 100 cars rush by. Nobody would let me cross. Not a single one. Some people's lives are just too important to stop for five seconds and let a drenched, miserable-looking teenage girl cross the street.

At UMass, the crossing situation is bad for the opposite reason. It has gotten to the point where pedestrians feel like they don't have to look both ways, and can simply step out into the street and anybody will stop for them because they're Jesus walking on the water. If you do this, please stop. You back up traffic and cause gridlock in the intersections at the north and south ends of campus. You make the buses arrive late so the people riding them are late to class.

Also, pedestrians need to be aware that some people driving through campus, especially on weekends, are not from around here and will not stop for you. I'm not saying that it's right to drive like a jerk; I'm just telling you not to be stupid and look before you cross.

My suggestion is to use this $500,000 to aid in the effort to alleviate the traffic and parking situation in Massachusetts. The reason why people drive so aggressively in and around Boston is not because the drivers are all jerks, but because the traffic is ridiculous and there is nowhere to park most of the time. It's a pain in the neck, and people understandably get frustrated. Pulling drivers over and fining them isn't going to do anything but make them more angry and frustrated, and that doesn't solve anything. Let's get to the bottom of this problem and try to solve it in a more effective manner by implementing better civil planning and having more affordable and accommodating parking areas.

Campus events need student support

Mike Anmuth

The point of each weekly column is for me to editorialize something, to state my views and opinions on whatever issue that I see fit for that week and hope that people either agree or disagree with me when I write it. Sometimes, I like to change it up a bit and talk about things about which I'm passionate, often themes like University of Massachusetts athletics and other events happening on campus. This week will be one of those passion columns.

Coming up in the next week is the UMass Mac Expo on Wednesday, in the Student Union Ballroom between 11 a.m. and 4 p.m. I have seen the advertising around for it and since I'm somewhat of a not-so-hidden geek, I tend to want to find out more about these things. Being that I cannot live without my iPod, especially for long trips, I was interested when I saw a huge Apple logo on the posters and flyers displaying this upcoming event. Apple, in case you didn't know, is the company that makes the iPod as well as a bunch of computers that look rather like an iPod and some other really nifty objects.

... Campus events need students to come see them, so if you have an inkling of interest, stop by and take advantage of the hard work by your peers in organizing events, setting them up, financing them and arranging their subtleties.

So, I did what anyone does when they're curious about an event on campus; I went on the Internet and looked it up. I probably could have done various other things like went to the office of the Macintosh User Group, the student organization putting on the event, but the Internet is faster and more exciting and I could check my mail at the same time while pretending I was reading the eReserve for whatever class I happened to be procrastinating doing work for at the moment. Sure enough, I learned all about the event and its location, and since my iPod has become an indispensable part of my life, I figured that an exposition of a bunch of Apple products could be kind of interesting.

I'm told there will be plenty of things to see at the event, from Apple products and software (including my beloved iPod and the zillion things made for it) to music and movies and lions, and tigers, and bears, oh my. Perhaps there won't be any wild animals, or bad allusions to old films, but looking at the list of activities which will be on display makes me want to stop by the Ballroom and take a first-hand look. Since one of my hobbies is procrastination, and not just on class readings, this Wednesday will make a perfect opportunity to stop in and see some exhibits.

Somewhere in here, I'm supposed to write an opinion, so if excitement counts as an opinion then I have that one squared away. I'm a rather large fan of events on campus and I try to go to different ones of different types as my schedule permits, from athletics to events like this Mac expo and even to things like the majors fair last semester. If I didn't have a major, I would have been just as excited about that one, too. The point I'm trying to make is that campus events need students to come see them, so if you have an inkling of interest, stop by and take advantage of the hard work by your peers in organizing events, setting them up, financing them and arranging the subtleties, like advertising and promotion.

Supposing this column leads into the greater point, that is to get involved on campus in activities, this is just another good way. It's spring time, the weather is warm and soon enough, we'll be entering the summer and going home to our respective towns and cities to do home things and forgetting about the town of Amherst for a couple of months. For this remaining month and some odd weeks, get involved by going to events (there are still many happening) or club meetings or watching the athletics or participating in intramurals, or do all of them, and end up managing to still attend class every once in a while.

Basically, there's a Macintosh exposition coming up on Wednesday and you should go to it because it's exciting, it's run by some really good people and it's a good way to get out of doing your homework for class, which is the basis and reason why I recommend lots of things. The spring has sprung and while everyone is sitting on the green listening to their iPod, check out some of the other things that Apple makes while getting involved in an event on your campus. Hey, you might just see me there.

attempt to shatter genre boundaries

By Ian Jones
Collegian Correspondent

The Mars Volta's debut album, "De-Loused in the Comatorium," was praised for its prog-inspired rhythms, technical proficiency and fire-breathing intensity, and proved that there was a lot more to Cedric Bixler and Omar Rodriguez than their previous band, At The Drive-In, would imply. With their latest effort, "Frances the Mute," the Mars Volta have taken all of that and applied it to an even more complex and ambitious theme: a story based on a diary found by former bandmate Jeremy Ward, who died of a drug overdose in 2003, which tells of an orphan searching for his biological parents.

The Mars Volta
'Frances the Mute'
Universal

The band's current lineup features Cedric Bixler-Zavala and Omar Rodriguez-Lopez of At The Drive-In on vocals and guitar, respectively, and Omar takes over as producer on this album. Jon Theodore of Golden returns on the drums and Juan Alderete de la Peña — he went by the simpler John Alderete when he was playing with Paul Gilbert in 80s metal band Racer X — takes over for Flea on bass. Ikey Owens of Sublime/Long Beach Dub All-Stars, returns on keys and is joined by Omar's younger brother, Marcel. Flea and John Frusciante of the Red Hot Chili Peppers both return for guest appearances, John on guitar and Flea on trumpet.

But what do they sound like? It's a hard question to answer in large part because Cedric and Omar try so hard to defy classification. One minute they're a fast, angular burst of progressive fury, the next a slow wash of electronic noise, then perhaps afro-Cuban rock with Cedric wailing in Spanish, which cuts to three minutes of birds chirping. Indie-prog? Emo-jazz-fusion? Something like that.

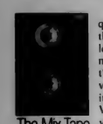
The fifteen tracks on "Frances" make up five actual songs, none of which are the album's title track — you'll have to pick up the single for "The Widow" if you want to hear that. The album instead opens with a song about the album's protagonist, called "Cygnus. Vismund Cygnus," which starts with Cedric singing over Omar's acoustic guitar and soft strains of strings and explodes into prog theatrics, with Omar's screeching guitar and Jon Theodore's manic drumming in the foreground. Juan Alderete proves that he can hang with Flea, and Cedric begins to show off his voice. This fades to a soft drum beat with Juan's bass, and Omar comes back in for an extended guitar solo, after which the band returns to their previous intensity. The song ends with electronic noise and the sounds of a highway, before leading into the next track.

"The Widow" is the album's only single, probably because it's the only song on the album that doesn't last for more then ten minutes. Omar brings the acoustic guitar back out, although the song is riddled with electric solos, and Jon tones down his drumming a bit, while Juan supplies a slow but solid bass line. Ikey lays down a nice organ track and Flea shows that he can play a mean trumpet. Cedric's vocals are the focus of this song, although his lyrics are still as confusing as ever. This lasts for a little over three minutes before Cedric's voice becomes a distorted wave of noise, introducing the next song.

"L'Via L'Viaquez," the album's most interesting song, begins with Cedric singing in Spanish over a mid-tempo rock song, but switches to a lazy afro-Cuban mood, urged on by Ikey's work on electric piano, and Cedric switches back to English. This turns into distorted percussion that explodes into one of the most intense guitar solos on the album, and the whole thing repeats again. The song fades out with Omar's angular soloing over the same afro-Cuban beat and Cedric's distorted singing.

The next song, "Miranda That Ghost Just Isn't Holy Anymore," opens with the sound of birds chirping and a ghost-like electronic noise, with echoes of Cedric's high-pitched wail in the background. Flea's trumpet announces Omar's effects-laden guitar, and Juan sets a slow pace, while Cedric comes in and shows off his range. Jon joins in at around the eight-minute mark, and the song slowly fades back out to Flea's trumpet.

The album's final song, called "Cassandra Gemini," is an epic musical journey clocking in at over thirty minutes, and it features awe-inspiring performances by each member of the band. Omar breaks off into angular shredding, Cedric switches between a soft moan and a soulful wail, Ikey shows off his speed on the keys while strings play above him and Jon and Juan provide an intensely complex background to work with. The album fades out as it began, with Cedric singing over Omar's acoustic and soft strings, and a wash of electronics fades to silence.



For all its complexity, "Frances" is both intriguing and easy to listen to, and the transitions from blazing intensity to pure ambient noise are greeted as natural pieces of the songs they make up. Cedric and Omar have both become better musicians since "De-Loused," and their song-writing abilities have become simply astounding. If "Frances" is this good, the future holds some amazing possibilities for the Mars Volta.

The Mix Tape
Matt O'Rourke

The piano is quite possibly the most timeless instrument, with little change or variation since its invention. With the advent of electronic music, keyboards have allowed the piano to progress into the modern era, and musicians have taken advantage of the two, time and time again. This week's mix tape explores the piano through a variety of mediums, and the artists who incorporated them into their music.

"Please Forgive Me"- David Gray (5:35)

Singer-songwriter David Gray's great crossing-over album, "White Ladder," opens with this track. A simple piano melody, backed by synthesizers and drummer Clune's impressive rhythm, kicks the song into high gear. Gray's lyrics are the backbone of his music, as he sings, "Throw a stone and watch the ripples flow/Moving out across the bay/I like a stone I fall into your eyes/Deep into some mystery." This simple imagery combined with a basic melody leads into an acoustic guitar feature, as the track comes full circle. So much is present in "Please Forgive Me" as is in all of Gray's music, that the listener will find his or herself tapping their foot along to the beat.

"Levon" – Elton John (5:24)

Elton John is known for his bright melodies and for the most part, feel-good music. "Levon" however, captures a dark period of time in world history— during the Vietnam War. "He was born a pauper to a pawn on a Christmas day/When the New York Times said, 'God is dead'/And the war's begun/Alvin Tostig has a son today." Elton sings while continuing to play bright chords on piano while backed by powerful strings. The track is perfect for when the times aren't going the way one expected, and especially in times of war. It may go without saying that Elton John's voice is superb-hitting the highs and lows at the right moment every time and never missing a beat. The emotion of the music is easily felt by the listener, and this type of passion is what all musicians should strive to achieve. Although the actual story within the song is a bit eccentric, the experience is enjoyable overall.

"Brick" – Ben Folds Five (4:43)

Considered by some to be the "Elton John of the new generation," Ben Folds' hit song "Brick" is next. Instantly recognizable by the first three chords, "Brick" is the first truly dark track on this week's tape. Albeit a depressing track, Ben Folds Five tells us that we cannot always find happiness in everything we think we need— even if that may be a significant other. One may even go so far as to try and convince themselves of this, as he sings "Then I walk down to buy her flowers, and sell some gifts that I've got." The group was a unique act for rock music— a standup bass, piano, and drums. Their impression is still lasting today, as Ben Folds continues to tour solo, and the group's albums are considered to be classics in their own right.

"Gravity" – Embrace (4:38)

Fans of Coldplay, Travis, or any other major British pop band of the past 10 years will find themselves immediately attached to Embrace. While they may sound very similar to the aforementioned groups, Embrace still manages to create a brilliant pop song (and Coldplay is given proper credit for helping them with their latest album in the linear notes). With vocals similar to that of Train, Danny McNamara has crafted a soothing and layered love ballad about everyone's favorite force of nature. The brilliance lies in that as much gravity pulls us down, it also pulls us together, the band writes. Piano has a straightforward role in this track, however its simplicity is key to the entire song— as it pulls everything together. "Gravity" is a track that can be appreciated on first listen, but after multiple listens, one can find more to love.
(Independiente/Epic, 2004)

"Angry Young Man"- Billy Joel (5:28)

It should come as no surprise that the "Piano Man" himself has made it on to this week's tape. However, "Angry Young Man" is an underappreciated track. The piano can only be described as "insane" in this song. Using his pointer fingers as human drumsticks, Joel blasts away on the keys for the opening segment of this track soon to be joined by master drummer Liberty DeVito. Joel and DeVito seemingly duel each other for the best percussionist, fighting to see who can produce the most speed before later joining up in the first verse. "Angry Young Man" is surefire track for fans of fast punk or ska-music (i.e.- the Mighty Mighty Bosstones). The cohesiveness of Joel's piano with the rest of his band is unparalleled, and it's no surprise considering their 30-year career together.

"Airbag" – Christopher O'Riley (3:47)

This track is perhaps one of the most interesting concept albums released in recent years. Christopher O'Riley, a master of classical piano, has recorded an entire album ("True Love Waits") devoted to Radiohead, where every track is a cover, only on piano. Appealing (obviously) to fans of Radiohead, rock music, or classical, "Airbag" is a fast, dynamically varied, and beautiful. O'Riley attempts the impossible and succeeds as he plays every part, including vocals, on piano. Heavy chords featuring dark undertones are danced upon by the light melody. Even Johnny Greenwood's drowning guitar solo is covered brilliantly, as the O'Riley builds for the final moments of track. O'Riley has fashioned a piece of musical genius, one that both classical aficionados and rock enthusiasts are sure to appreciate.

Despite a few flaws in gameplay, EA Sports still delivers 'BIG'

"Fight Night Round 2" allows players to train against such boxing legends as Evander Holyfield and Muhammad Ali.

"FIFA Street" is more difficult than other games in the "Street" series, which may frustrate novice players.

Gaming giant Electronic Arts has pumped out more hits than Ron Art-est in recent months. Games such as "MVP 2005," "Fight Night Round 2," and "FIFA Soccer" are some of their most recent hits, but with the hits there come a few misses.

It is not an easy task to follow up the highly anticipated "MVP Baseball 2005," yet EA managed to release another highly anticipated sequel with "Fight Night Round 2." The game has greatly improved since the original hit shelves last year. The fighters take more realistic damage, the fights overall are more realistic, the opponents have gotten tougher, and EA has added new techniques for your fighter's vast array of punches with the 'EA Roundhouse' specials.

"Round 2"'s first upgrade that will please fans of the original are the cutting and swelling trainers. These are key guys to have as they will reduce swelling and bleeding during matches to allow your fighter to last longer. With money you earn in career mode, you can buy guys that are better at one portion or another.

"Round 2" also plays with more realism than the 2004 version. The rings will take you from fighting in training facilities, to small venues, to big time arenas. The arenas' graphics are very detailed for something that is nothing more than background eye-candy. The boxers are closer to the real thing as they can lose their 'stuff' if they just constantly punch.

"Round 2" delivers a solid hit for fans of the first "Fight Night," but the game play can become drawn out after a while. It makes for an excellent alternative for fighting games to play with your gaming buddies; in your room or even, online. Enjoy mastering the technique of throwing the roundhouse specials while beating on greats like Muhammad Ali, Joe Frazier, Evander Holyfield and Roy Jones Jr.

"Fight Night Round 2" is an excellent follow up that leaves players waiting for the next installment, while "Fifa Street" was not as impressive. Using EA's hit franchises "FIFA Soccer" and their EA Big 'street' line of games seemed to create a winning combination, yet the game leaves something to be desired.

"FIFA Street," while not a strong hit, shows a lot of promise. They have installed the right music, teams, players, and abilities that are needed for a street soccer game to be entertaining. It is the difficulty, at times, which may bother players. A team that may be ranked to able to beat you five times out of five will be easily taken down, even if you are at a novice skill level.

'Fight Night: Round 2'	'--'FIFA Street'	'Rugby 2005'
Playstation	Playstation	Playstation

Developer: EA Sports	Developer: EA Canada	Developer: HB Studio
RPG	RPG	RPG

The game does have a solid ground to improve on to create a smash sequel for EA Big in the future, but right now "FIFA Street" resembles "Fight Night 2004." Meaning it has all the makings to be a big hit, such as having the unique style building ability to make a player a powerhouse or a speed-demon, but just falls short of having something to keep players interested.

If you ever wanted to know why sports that are not highlighted on ESPN do not get video games. "Rugby 2005" would be your answer. For American fans of the sport, they might be disappointed to the game's 2004 follow-up.

While the game forces you to learn how to play before you can go into a game, it will not help unless you are fully aware of the rules of the game. Even then, it is doubtful you will be able to manage the controls well enough to then explain it to your friend, who has no idea about the sport.

"Rugby 2005" is undoubtedly a big disappointment for American fans that might be looking into the sport through this game. The matches seem to go forever, or at least until you decide that losing 10-0 is about as much as you can deal with before pulling the plug. But for those who are fans of the sport, it might be worth the risk.

Even despite a few flaws in the last two games, EA has always been the innovator for great sports games. With ESPN and 989 Sports proving to be tough competition in the sports genre, EA recently dropped prices of "MVP 2005" to around $30. "Fight Night Round 2" and "Fifa Street" are available on all three major consuls. "Rugby 2005" is available for X-Box, PS2 and PC.

The many sides of Queen Latifah

By Mike Szymanski
Zap2it.com

Queen Latifah commands a room just by walking in with her dangling earrings and long colorful robe-like clothes. She's smiling as she walks in to an interview with Zap2it.com because she happy with her successes, her career and her hair.

"People need to go to the beauty shop," she says. "Someone rubs your head, they wash it, they fix it, and I mean they're touching on you for a good hour or so once a week. So this is like your therapy."

Not only is she a Grammy-winning rapper, but she has had runaway box office success with her movie with Steve Martin, "Bringing Down the House," and has a best supporting actress Oscar nomination for her role as Mama Morton in "Chicago."

Everything she touches seems to turn to gold, but she quips, "I'm trying to get it to turn to diamonds. Damn it, I've got to get my alchemy on."

Not only has she taken a character introduced in "Barbershop 2" and brought it to Atlanta for "Beauty Shop," but she's producer of the film, too. And sure, she's clowning around with the actresses on the set, giving pet names to Djimon Honsou and Mena Suvari, making Andie MacDowell and Kevin Bacon crack up, insisting Sherri Shepherd, Alicia Silverstone and the other girls in the shop go to hairdressing boot camp and racing golf carts on the set with Alfre Woodard, who's in one of her funniest roles to date.

"My natural personality is to just clown and joke but yeah, I like my little golf cart," Latifah demonstrates swerving as if driving a cart. "I got that thing down to a perfect slide. Alfre always wanted to race me."

The fellow actors knew she was the boss, but she didn't act like it. "I just always wanted to have some control over my future," she says. "I wanted to be a part of the decision-making process."

And so, she decided her own hair stylist would be a consultant. "Who knows better than her?" Latifah insists. "It was all a team effort."

Director Bill Woodruff tells Zap2it Latifah demonstrated on acting once the shooting began, but was still good at putting out fires when needed as producer. "She knows how to trash talk and have fun, and knows when to focus, and everyone likes her," Woodruff says.

Indeed, although her film takes place in an African-American neighborhood at a beauty shop, she says, "It's not a black film or a film just for black people. It's really about relationships."

Latifah has always had a wide variety of friends and fans. "I had the kids, the grandmothers, gay, straight, black, white, everything in between. It's always been this broad sort of audience that has been down with Queen Latifah. So I think that it's a beautiful thing because that's how I look at the world."

And, it's not beyond her that she can command her own projects and play a romantic lead and be a plus-sized African American woman. "Beauty comes from the inside. It does start in here," she says. "Most women don't even need a lot of makeup. They just put all this crap on their faces and clog up your pores, get pimples and stuff."

And, almost daily, when she's trying to relax in a bowling alley or kicking back with friends, she has women come up to her and say how they identify with her. "There's no greater reward than having a positive impact on someone. Girls have come up to me and said, 'I look up to you. I used to feel insecure about myself, but looking at you and how you carry yourself is great.' There are grown women in their 40s and 50s saying the same thing."

So of course, sharing the first on-screen kiss with handsome hunk Djimon Honsou, the Academy Award nominee for "In America," was a special perk for her.

"She took it easy on me," Honsou says shyly. "But I'm very happy that I had my first kiss with her. I have so much love for the lady."

She says she'll never have bodyguards or cocoon her life from the rest of the world. Heck, she's even doing press interviews on her 35th birthday while her friends prepare a party for her across town in Hollywood. On the street, fans love talking to her and she admits, "People find me very approachable, but sometimes it wears you're ass out. It's only a problem when it's like 50 people, or one person every 10 minutes, but it's harder for the people around me who can't carry on an uninterrupted conversation."

For Latifah it's important to continue to connect with her fan base. "They see a big girl who carries herself with confidence and that example really helps a lot of young girls who look up and say 'Oh well, she's not a little girl but she's still doing it and she's making and she's wearing it well.' They need that. I mean I needed it and I didn't have it." Latifah laughs.

"There weren't too many people out there I could look up to who looked like me. So somebody now has someone out here who looks more like them who can still be that somebody making it and doing the things that they love and of course, being romantic, well shoot."

coach, but I think our guys are focused. I think we've gotten the message across that St. John's is not coming up here to lay down. They're a proud program right now ... and we're going to have to play very well in order to win the game."

St. John's is playing in its first lacrosse season since 1994, when the school decided cut the program.

Its first order of business as far as bringing the team back was to hire a very well respected and successful coach, and the Red Storm figured that Rick Sowell would be their man. Sowell, a four-year midfielder for the Baltimore Thunder of Major Indoor Lacrosse in the early 1990s, took Dartmouth to its first ever NCAA tournament in 2003.

Comprising an 11-3 record, Sowell was bounced in the first round of the tournament by Final Four qualifier and national powerhouse Syracuse, 15-13, in his fifth and final year at the helm for the Big Green.

Sowell strictly used 2004 as a time to recruit and rebuild the new program from the ground up, as indicated by the 26 rookies on the squad. Even with the team's inexperience, Cannella is quick to applaud the Red Storm players for buying into Sowell's system so quickly.

"It's taken them only a few months [to get the system working] from the fall to now," Cannella said. "He recruited his first year when he didn't coach, and they just recruited all of these top-notch kids. This fall, they bring in all of these young guys, and they work hard in the fall and improve... I think it's happened pretty quickly. The kids have bought into it, and they have tremendous athletes there. I think they're a very good team."

Cannella also said the most difficult task his Minutemen have tomorrow will be playing against a group of players for the first time ever, something of a rarity in conference play. Though the team still has access to St. John's game tapes, he said the unfamiliarity the teams have with one another will certainly play a factor.

UMass seeks vengence at BU

TENNIS from page 8

The Minutewomen have only faced Quinnipiac three times in the history of the program. The Bobcats have taken two of those matches with the lone win for UMass coming last year.

On April 12, 2004 the Maroon and White took down the Bobcats 5-3 at home. Senior captain Sasha Edelstein and junior Dorothy Iwanowicz were both able to pick up victories in both singles and doubles competition. Junior Jana Bartoloni was able to pick up a point in her singles match.

The Terriers have dominated the Minutewomen throughout the years. Of the ten times the two schools have faced each other, UMass has yet to pick up a victory over BU. The lopsided series dates all the way back to 1978.

UMass last fell to the Terriers on April 8, 2004. The match was very close, but BU came out on top 4-3. Iwanowicz was able to pick up a point for the Minutewomen, winning her her No. 5 tilt 6-4, 7-5.

Dixon, however, isn't worried about her team.

"These kids can compete," Dixon noted. "We have kids this year that can step up and show their ability."

Following its match against BU on Saturday, UMass wraps up its regular season with Senior Day on Monday against Holy Cross (4-9), in Amherst.

Originally, the A-10 tournament was scheduled to be played next weekend but recently it was moved back to April 22-24. Dixon says she scheduled three matches in four days to close out the season because she wanted her team to be in peak condition for the tournament.

"I did it this way because I wanted our team to be match tough for the A-10's," Dixon said. "Now we have 10 days in-between our last match against Holy Cross and the start of the tournament."

This time of year is when the Maroon and White usually take on Quinnipiac and the Terriers. Dixon added that she wanted to close out the season with Holy Cross on Senior Day, hopefully, with a win.

Kelley and seniors Denise Denis and Hilary Puglia. Kelley has four homeruns on the season with a team-high slugging percentage of .617, while Puglia has racked up three homers and 14 RBI. Denis leads the team with 23 RBI on the season. Senior designated player Pam Sulick has started almost every game for the Minutewomen and has done so in a way that has built confidence among the team.

"I think that team chemistry is critically important to a team and I think our chemistry is really, really good," Sortino said. "I think the nice part about our team is that every kid feels valued and they can make a contribution and they're not just along for the ride."

Despite the fact that many members of this group are leading the A-10 in several categories - Molinari in steals with 15, LaFogg in strikeouts with 106, Hilary Puglia in doubles with 7 - nobody on the team is caught up in the statistical portion of the game and that's the way Sortino likes it.

"They could care less [about stats], they just want to win," Sortino said. "It's the philosophy of our program. The kids that we have, they have to buy into it in the beginning that what the team does is far more important than what any individual does."

The Maroon and White will take the field tomorrow against GW, with Game 1 of the doubleheader beginning at 12 p.m. at the UMass Softball Complex.

A-10 season starts for UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will start its Atlantic 10 schedule at 3:00 this afternoon at Garber Field against La Salle. This will be the middle game in a three-game homestand for the Minutewomen that concludes on Sunday against another conference opponent, Saint Joseph's.

Execution is the main theme for coach Carrie Bolduc and company, as UMass prepares to rebound from a two game skid (losses to Boston College and Dartmouth) and enter the most crucial stretch of the season.

"We need to execute and do the simple things," Bolduc said. "It's the beginning of a new [conference] season and [the players] are well aware of that. Everything counts and matters. With that mentality they know that the small things are going to count - the simple things like catching and throwing."

The Minutewomen struggled Tuesday against a ranked Dartmouth squad that pressured the ball and forced 16 turnovers, but the feeling has been that the game against Dartmouth was not a discouraging loss and that better preparation is needed.

In the preseason, the Minutewomen were picked in a coaches poll to finish second in the A-10 after a third place finish last year (4-3) and the promise of an incoming recruiting class. The Maroon and White are 27-10 all-time in conference play; second only to Temple (36-2).

There is bad news for La Salle tomorrow as the Minutewomen are 6-0 in opening conference games and 6-0 against La Salle in the six times the teams have played. Last year's contest between these two teams yielded a thrilling bout that ended with a UMass victory in five overtime's. Then-freshman Samantha Sepulveda, with UMass down 12-11, scored a goal with 12-seconds remaining in regulation to send it into overtime. The Minutewomen took it from there.

Coach Bolduc has emphasized the importance of the conference schedule, even calling it a new season, a good mindset for a team that went 3-6 in its first nine games. La Salle will be the start of the A-10 season for the Minutewomen, who are in need of victories.

"We need to win these games," Bolduc said. "Both teams are very good and well coached. They're athletic, they're feisty and they don't give up. They are A-10 teams. Everyone is out to get to the finals so they are going to do whatever it takes and we need to come in with that same mentality."

Like rivalries, these conference games will all be hotly contested because of their importance, and the dynamic of the game could change with the intensity.

"Strategy-wise sometimes they'll change things up," Bolduc said. "Sometimes we'll change things up. It's always heated in conference."

UMass' next opponent will be the Saint Joseph's Hawks on Sunday, making it two conference games in a row. The Minutewomen are 10-1 all-time against the Hawks, including a tight 13-11 victory last year. When facing these two teams, Bolduc again came back to the age of the UMass squad, the youngest in the A-10 conference.

"They have a lot of experience and we don't so they are going to be tight games," Bolduc said. "We're going to have to play to the last minute and come up big. We're prepared to play them. We know that both teams are good teams and that we have to play our best to win."

Senior Judy Kestner clears the ball during the Minutewomen's 18-6 loss to Dartmouth on Tuesday. UMass plays La Salle today.

A new Storm on the horizon

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

On one side of the field will be a program with rich tradition, a 6-2 record and a locker room full of players who are trying to keep themselves in contention for a birth in the NCAA tournament.

On the other side will be a team that is fielding its first lacrosse squad in 11 years, sporting a 2-7 record which includes four straight outcomes on the wrong side and a locker room full of 26 freshmen.

Tomorrow at 1 p.m. at Garber Field, these two sides will meet, as the No. 10 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (6-2 1-1 ECAC) will hook up with the St. John's Red Storm (2-7 0-3 ECAC) in a conference matchup.

The Minutemen are coming off their best showing of the year, an 18-8 trouncing of Penn State, and UMass coach Greg Cannella said his team's preparation was a key factor.

"We reminded them that you played well last week because you worked hard last week, and you earned it," Cannella said. "And you've got to come back and prove it and earn it again every week."

Though the two teams are striving for different things this year, Cannella is still working hard to make sure his group doesn't slip up and fall victim to an upset before the schedule grows increasingly harder as April progresses.

"Success and failure are never final," Cannella said. "We talk about that what you did last week doesn't matter at all to St. John's because they're going to come out fired up, and it's 0-0 at the beginning of the game, and they have as good an opportunity as we do to win the game.

"You worry about [overlooking an opponent] as a

No auto-bid for ECAC

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

In college athletics the conference championship is always the immediate goal.

It is typically the game that solidifies postseason dreams for the nation's elite and provides a window of opportunity for smaller schools that would normally get overlooked by the selection committee of its respective sport.

However, in 2004 and this season, the East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC) will award a championship trophy that indicates the best team in conference but will not, on paper, give an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

In order for a conference to have an automatic qualifier (AQ), it needs to have at least six schools competing together for two years. In Division I lacrosse, there are only two conferences that do not have an AQ, the ECAC and the ACC.

The Atlantic Coast Conference (ACC) is a four-team league (North Carolina, Duke, Virginia and Maryland) and has not had an AQ in lacrosse in its history. However, the overall power of the conference has caused this to be a non-issue.

"In our case, with the fewer number of teams, it sets us up a little bit better, because we have a strong and dominant league in men's lacrosse," ACC Director of Championships Davis Whitfield said.

For the ECAC, which currently has six teams, the lack of an AQ stems from a redistribution of teams over the past four years, which caused it to fall below the quota of six during the 2004 season.

Stony Brook switched conferences after the 2001 season when its entire athletic department changed allegiances to the America East Conference. This change left the ECAC with the bare minimum number of participants.

After the 2003 season, University of Maryland - Baltimore County (UMBC) and Navy followed suit, with UMBC joining Stony Brook in the America East Conference and Navy switching over to the Patriot League.

With the ECAC down to four teams it lost its AQ and was in search of new competition. It added St. John's, Hobart, and Loyola for this season, but since the seven-team league had not been together for two years, it could not regain its AQ.

"We were seeking institutions interested in this league with a commitment in lacrosse on campus suits this conference," Commissioner of the ECAC Phil Buttafuoco said. "We tried to get [the ECAC's AQ] back, but it didn't happen."

The ECAC will also be adding Fairfield University next season, rounding out an eight-team league.

Even though the number of participants will and has been over the set quota, the ECAC will not receive an automatic bid until the 2007 season.

Even with the lack of an AQ, Buttafuoco is confident that it will not negatively affect the conference. With three teams in the top 20 (Georgetown No. 5, Massachusetts No. 10, and Hobart No. 15) and one receiving votes (Loyola with 10) the ECAC stands as one of the strongest conferences in Division I lacrosse and will provide each team with enough quality opponents to garner an at-large bid.

"I don't think it hurts our conference because of the great competition, week in and week out we have some of the strongest teams," Buttafuoco said.

Unlike the ECAC, the ACC has a conference tournament at the end of the season, giving each of the four teams a shot at the conference championship. This year the ACC has three teams in the top six (Duke No. 2, Virginia No. 3, and Maryland No. 6), yet North Carolina (2-6, 0-2 ACC) can potentially bring home the conference crown.

Whitfield mentioned that the Tar Heels could still make the NCAA tournament if they win the ACC tournament, due to the two quality wins, and the prestige of the ACC.

UMass coach Greg Cannella, who is adamant that his team approaches every game with the same tenacity, understands the importance of the ECAC getting back its AQ, but mentioned that it doesn't change the way a team approaches the season.

"We like to think that our conference is a strong conference, so whether you have an automatic bid or not," Cannella said. "If you play six quality opponents and are named the conference champion, you should have a good shot at the tournament."

UM softball team looks to keep momentum

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Since sweeping the doubleheader against Maine on Wednesday, the Massachusetts softball team (13-11-1 2-2 Atlantic 10) is hoping to start a trend that revolves around the concept of winning. The Minutewomen won their first two A-10 games against Dayton on March 26 and proceeded to drop the next two conference games against Fordham. Tomorrow UMass looks to take its conference record above the .500 mark as it hosts A-10 foe George Washington (8-18 3-1 A-10).

"I know we have to pick up where we left off, I know these are very important games to us," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "The conference is our doorway to postseason play and they're obviously critically important games."

While GW is primarily made up of young players - 13 freshman and two sophomores - the Maroon and White will have to slow down the likes of GW freshman outfielder Jackie Yaniga and the rest of the Colonial batters. In her 26 starts, Yaniga has accumulated a conference-high eight homeruns with 30 RBI and a slugging percentage of .841. UMass will also have to deal with freshman infielder Caroline Howe, who has amassed 23 hits and 11 RBI during her first collegiate season. The Minutewoman defense is counting on shutting down the Colonials, as it did to Maine on Wednesday. The defensive game is something that Sortino is focused on with sophomore infielder Amanda Morin holding a fielding percentage of .946.

"If things are close I'll go with the better defender as oppose to the bat, because I just believe that hitting comes and goes, but defense is what keeps you there," Sortino said. "I just think we have a very strong defensive team. I think defense is critically important."

The keys of the defensive play for UMass are senior pitcher Barb LaFogg (9-7) and junior pitcher Jenna Busa (4-4), who have impressed Sortino in their play this season. LaFogg leads the A-10 in strikeouts with 106 and has an ERA of 2.44 on the season, while Busa pitched nine strikeouts and allowed one hit in the Game 2 shutout against Maine. Sortino was pleased with the work her pitchers put in against the Black Bears, with the duo limiting Maine to one run and three hits. Sortino saw that performance a vast improvement from the two losses against Fordham last Monday.

"We went back and looked at that tape [against Fordham] and we wouldn't have looked at it that way unless [the loss] happened to us," Sortino said. "And looking at that tape gave us some simple adjustments to give us those two pitching performances."

The other side of the game includes an assortment of batters who have collectively scored runs all season. Freshman outfielder Lauren Proctor leads the team in batting average with a mark of .362 and has 10 RBI on the season. Prior to Game 2 against Maine, Proctor recorded at least one hit in 13 straight games, but that record ended as she did not register a hit against the Black Bears. Proctor is joined by two other freshmen on the team, infielders Stacy Cullington and Sarah Hurd, who both started in last Wednesday's games against Maine.

The season regulars consist of sophomore outfielder Candice Molinari, junior catcher Kl

UM faces Quinnipiac

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (12-6 4-0 Atlantic 10) enters the final weekend of the regular season today against Quinnipiac (7-7 2-0 Northeast Conference), in Hampden, Conn. Tomorrow the Minutewomen take on in-state rival Boston University (8-6) at the Upper Boyden Courts.

UMass enters the matches on fire coming off shutouts of A-10 rivals Rhode Island and Fordham. The Minutewomen are also on a five-game winning streak and have won six of their last seven matches. In those seven matches, they have taken the doubles point every time. UMass coach Judy Dixon credits her assistant Celeste Frey for her team's dominance in doubles.

"Celeste worked tirelessly this winter on doubles," Dixon said. "Doubles are important because they are such a momentum builder and we've won a lot of our matches with the doubles point."

The Bobcats also come into to the match on a high note. On April 1 they blanked the Wagner Seahawks 7-0 in a NEC face off. The win made it seven of nine for Quinnipiac.

Also this week it was announced that Quinnipiac senior Liz Ader was named the NEC Women's Tennis Player of the Week for going 4-0 against Wagner and Army. In a loss to Army and a win against Wagner, Axler was able to win half of her matches.

BU on the other hand, comes in into the match losing four out of the last five matches. The Terriers, however, were able to stop a four-match losing streak on April 2 with a win over Dartmouth, in Boston. They defeated Dartmouth 5-2 by taking five of the six singles matches that were played.

Minutemen try to end skid against Duquesne

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team will look to break a nine-game losing streak when Duquesne travels to Amherst for a three-game weekend series at Earl Lorden Field. Saturday a doubleheader is slated to begin at noon, followed by the second game at 2:30. The third game will be on Sunday at noon.

Duquesne (6-16) has not had an easy time outside of Pittsburgh this season, posting a 5-12 record on the road. This will be UMass' first Atlantic-10 series played at home.

"It's a good opportunity for us to play well," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I thought right from the beginning that the Atlantic 10 schedule was set up well for us. We just need to play well."

The Minutemen put up a season-high six runs this Wednesday at home, but gave up four runs in the eighth inning to lose a heartbreaker, 7-6, to Hartford. After starting pitcher Jeremy Demers gave up three runs in 5.1 innings, reliever Scott McGovern was able to put an end to Hartford's threat in the sixth, but gave up four runs in the seventh.

"We're concerned [about the pitching depth]," Stone said. "After about seven pitchers, we dropped off significantly. Looking back, you always want to look towards the weekend. A-10 weekends are our bread and butter games, but maybe we should have kept [Demers] in longer because we needed a win. Though, I was confident in the decision at the time."

Though they would have preferred a win, the Maroon and White can see development in their younger players. The freshmen catchers, Dan Coudy and Pat Garrity, show this improvement as both players had stellar games on Wednesday.

Coudy hit his first career home-run against Hartford while going 2-for-4 with two runs batted in from the designated hitters position. Garrity was the most consistent at the plate, reaching base safely in all four of his plate appearances and going 2-for-2 with two walks, including his second walk coming back from a 1-2 count.

"He's going to be a good player," Stone said. "He's adjusting, but he hasn't played like a freshman. He has shown a lot of maturity and is just getting adjusted at the plate after struggling early. I think he will be a solid catcher who will help the pitching staff and that's key for a catcher."

The Duquesne pitching staff has a solid bullpen in setup pitcher Matt Melillo (2.24 earned run average) and closer Nick Jones (4.22 ERA, one save). The starting rotation is a different story, as only one of the starting pitchers with two or more starts has an ERA under five. Junior Bob Hartle sports a 4.85 ERA, but he is 0-2 in three starts. Stone believes getting as many runs as possible is more important than getting early runs against the shaky starting pitchers.

"We just trying to get runs every inning," Stone said. "It's hard to choose when you score runs. It's nice score early, get a lead and gain confidence going into the later innings. But we just need score as many runs as possible."

The UMass batting average has risen over the last few games, but Stone feels there is still work needed to be done.

"I think we still need to hit better," Stone said. "Our team batting average has gotten higher, but it's still not where it should be. Our team batting average is .200 and theirs is .264 with three kids hitting over .300. We need to do more things offensively and that's not necessarily getting hits. There are a lot of different ways you can contribute offensively without getting hits."

The doubleheader will feature UMass pitcher Matt Torra in the first game and Brian Doherty in the second. Torra and Doherty combined to give up only one hit in the first four innings of the 7-3 loss to Holy Cross. The third game will feature Demers, who pitched 5.1 innings on Wednesday.

Phil Saviano tells his story about clergy abuse law suit

By Nina Lowy
Collegian Staff

Last week on April 5, Phil Saviano, a survivor of clergy sexual abuse, spoke at the University of Massachusetts. Saviano's story is an unprecedented one being the first Massachusetts victim who was able to settle a clergy-abuse lawsuit without signing a confidentiality agreement.

Saviano recalls most of the abuse occurred when he was twelve years old, and living in a small town outside of Worcester. He described the abuse as a "grooming process."

In the beginning, Saviano and his friend, who was also molested by Father David Holley, were asked to do simple chores around the church, such as moving boxes, in exchange for 50 cents for an ice cream. This eventually turned into the priest showing the young boys sexually explicit playing cards with pictures of men and women on them, and discussion about sex. The abuse began when the priest repeatedly asked for oral sex from Saviano in the basement of the church. Saviano remembers the priest's grip around his wrist when he tried to pry it off.

"It was a huge conflict for me. I wanted the groundskeeper to look in and see [through the window], and I didn't want him to see," Saviano said.

After eighteen months, Holley left the church and nobody asked any questions as to why. Saviano survived high school despite being insecure and developing depression. He graduated college from UMass in 1975 with a degree in zoology, and received his master's degree in communication from Boston University. In the 1980's he began to do publicity for concerts. It was not until

Former Clinton aide, author speaks during Gaypril event

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The "down low," a term that is now being used to describe men who are in relationships with women, while secretly having sex with other men is a myth perpetuated by the media said a speaker at the University of Massachusetts Thursday evening.

Keith Boykin, a former Clinton aide and author of the book, "Beyond the Down Low: Sex, Lies and Denial in Black America," was the keynote speaker for the Stonewall Center's Gaypril events.

The myth of the down low, said Boykin, came from the misinformation of one man, J.L. King. King's book, "On the Down Low," claims to reveal that there is a new phenomena of men, especially black men, who are living on the down low, and that this phenomena is contributing to the AIDS epidemic.

Boykin said that this was not the truth, asking where the evidence of such a phenomena was.

"How can you study someone on the down low, someone who is doing something in secret? Once they come out to tell you that they're on the down low, they aren't on the down low anymore," he said.

Boykin also pointed out that the facts that King presented about the down low were wrong.

Northampton fashion designer addresses domestic violence

By Kim Seymour
Collegian Staff

A Northampton fashion designer spoke out against the domestic violence that stole the lives of her daughter and grandson at a conference Friday in the Campus Center.

Yoko Kato immigrated to Western Massachusetts from Japan in the 1960s with the hopes of beginning a new life with her American husband.

After the birth of her two daughters and years of domestic abuse, Kato left to start over as a single mother. Working full-time during the day and attending fashion design school at night, she successfully opened a bridal store in Northampton in 1980. Owning her own business enabled Kato to send both of her daughters to college.

Her youngest daughter fell in love and became pregnant after one year of higher education.

"My daughter came home from college and met a boy," Kato said. "He did everything for her. He came to her at the wrong time of her life."

Opting to have the baby, she dropped out of school. When the baby, Cedric, was 18 months, Kato's daughter decided to leave the father, who was not providing any support. According to Kato, one night in 1993, Cedric's father went to her daughter's apartment. After a heated argument over child support, he grabbed a knife and stabbed Cedric and his mother 57 times.

"Nine of the stabbings were through the baby's heart and her heart. That's how tight she was holding him," Kato said. "She tried to fight back. She fell with the boy in her arms. After stabbing her below the eye, the knife was stuck in her eye socket, that's why he said he stopped."

Kato now travels the nation speaking out against domestic violence. She has even returned home to Japan to improve women's living conditions. In 2002, Kato contributed to the passing of the first law in Japan against domestic abuse. She said her motivation to be an activist came six days after the death of her daughter and grandson when she joined a group of demonstrators against domestic violence at the court house in Northampton.

"Before [the deaths of my daughter and grandson] I wasn't a good person," Kato said. "I wasn't one who would do things for other people. I was busy trying to raise my children the way I wanted to. But [after their deaths] people were helping who didn't know my daughter."

Kato was just one of the speakers at the conference on abusive relationships, organized by UMass senior Christina Knowles, who decided to do this conference as her honors thesis project.

"Many people think women must do something to provoke abuse," Knowles said. "Society as a whole has little regard for abused women. Knowledge is empowerment."

The conference hosted a panel of experts including Ruth Trujillo, director of programs at Safe Passage of Northampton; La Wanza Lett-Brewington, community education director at the Everywoman's Center; and Tanya Kachwaha, teen education specialist also at the Everywomen's Center.

Trujillo focused on the options made available to women looking to leave violent domestic lives.

"There are four problems women think about when they leave the house: fear; [their] children; resources; and health issues," she said.

Trujillo said there are very few services that are accommodating to people who do not speak English as a first language or have special needs. Another problem is the constant budget shrinkage, she asserted.

Lett-Brewington added that people do not choose to be with someone who is going to hurt them.

"It happens very slowly, very methodically and very intentionally," she said.

She suggests we avoid asking "Why is she staying" but instead "Why is he doing this and what can make him stop?"

The third panelist, Kachwaha, specializes in prevention.

Working primarily with teens, she visits schools to educate on the "red flags" of abuse and also the importance of outside support.

"Many people think women must do something to provoke abuse," Knowles said. "Society as a whole has little regard for abused women. Knowledge is empowerment."

The conference hosted a panel of experts including Ruth Trujillo, director of programs at Safe Passage of Northampton; La Wanza Lett-Brewington, community education director at the Everywoman's Center; and Tanya Kachwaha, teen education specialist also at the Everywomen's Center.

"Trust your instinct, even as an outside observer," she said. "We should be careful not to judge - that everybody needs support."

Also at the conference were Mary Kociela, director of Domestic Violence Projects at the Northwestern District Attorney's office and Russell Bradbury-Carlin, director of MOVE program at the Men's Resource Center. All of the speakers made sure to mention that domestic violence does not only refer to men abusing women and not all men are abusers.

GEO rallies for contract negotiations

Hundreds of members of the UMass community rally on campus voicing thier displeasure with the contract negotiations with the UMass administration.

The Graduate Employee Organization and the University of Massachusetts have been bitterly negotiating back and forth over a new contract for more than a year.

After repeated efforts to settle an agreement at the bargaining table, GEO has decided to make an effort through a number of demonstrations to voice their displeasure in and throughout campus.

The GEO of UMass is a labor union that represents 2400 graduate employees. UMass graduate students first started to assemble in the late seventies but have worked as a union for 15 years. Every three years the GEO and the University have worked together to negotiate a new legally binding contract.

"Our bargaining teams began negotiating with each other last March. Every contact negotiation in the past has been a struggle, but not to this extreme. In these negotiations the university has been consistently unwilling to give us anything but regressive cutbacks," said Jed Murr, Vice-President of GEO.

These "cutbacks" include lowering GEO's real wages and an increase in the costs of healthcare and childcare.

The officers of the Massachusetts Society or Professors, the union for faculty, recently endorsed a statement in support of GEO in its attempt to secure a fair contract.

"We oppose the University's attempts to off-load health insurance costs onto graduate student employees and equally we oppose the imposition of these costs on departments.

We believe the administration can and should find a better way to meet these costs without creating burdens for graduate students and faculty.

Asking Graduate students employees to pick up these additional costs would negatively impact our ability to compete with other institutions in recruiting strong graduate students."

The proposed new raises would increase GEO member's salaries by 2 percent every year.

"Which sounds great," said Murr. "But the cost of living increase is 3.8 percent per year. So we wouldn't be receiving raises that stay current with the costs of living on campus."

"A lot of our members are already living below the poverty line. On top of that, the University is asking us to pay hundreds of dollars a year for

Cardinals begin choosing Pope

By Niko Price
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Cardinals began "an intense period of silence and prayer" before their conclave to choose the next pope, saying Saturday they would stop speaking publicly to protect the strict secrecy surrounding the centuries-old tradition.

The throngs of pilgrims who attended John Paul II's funeral Friday flowed out of Rome, leaving mainly tourists in a quiet, rainy St. Peter's Square. The Vatican said a decision on calls to put John Paul on a fast track to sainthood would rest with the next pope.

Italian Cardinal Francesco Marchisano celebrated the second Mass for John Paul in St. Peter's Basilica, a daily rite over nine days that began with the funeral Mass. His homily praised "this infinite humanity" that he called the late pope's hallmark.

The Vatican also released photographs of the pope's tomb, a white marble slab, slightly raised off the floor and tilted, with the Latin letters IOANNES PAULUS PPII, and the dates of his 26-year reign. It also bears the first two letters of Christ's name in Greek, a common symbol with roots in early Christianity.

The grave is in the small grotto once occupied by the sarcophagus of Pope John XXIII, which was moved into the main floor of St. Peter's Basilica after his 2000 beatification because so many pilgrims wanted to visit his tomb.

Parishoners planning to protest church closings

BROOKLINE — Members of seven parishes ordered closed by the Boston Archdiocese vowed Sunday to continue holding round-the-clock protest vigils despite Archbishop Sean O'Malley's decision to reopen two of the churches.

Parishioners said O'Malley and other senior church officials employed a flawed and arbitrary process for deciding which churches will reopen and which will remain closed.

healthcare. Asking graduate students with families to pay a huge amount of money for Childcare which will in effect make it impossible for some graduate students to work here," said Murr.

Presidents of the other state colleges in UMass have stepped up and lobbied for their employees to get 4 percent wages and were successful. UMass President Jack Wilson, Massachusetts' highest paid state employee, has yet to voice any concern towards raising GEO member's wages.

When asked to comment on the union negotiations, Susan Chinman, labor relations specialist for UMass, wrote in an email to The Daily Collegian that the University is "working hard to reach a contract settlement with GEO that satisfies both sides' interests and concerns. We believe that the details of bargaining should remain at the bargaining table while negotiations take place."

According to Murr, The Boston Globe and other publications have reported recently that there has been a dramatic decline in tenured-track faculty members at UMass.

"As there are less and less tenured-track faculty, the university looks towards other groups to perform to carry out the labor. These groups include adjunct faculty members and graduate student employees. So if they can pay us less it saves them financially," said Murr. "And these cuts have nothing to do with the state-wide budget cuts. Our research shows they can afford to pay us fair wages, they can afford to give us free healthcare, and they can afford to give us affordable childcare."

Over 600 members and allies of the GEO recently held a "Mass March" around the campus of UMass to demand a fair contract from the University. The large crowd, the biggest at a UMass rally protest in years, marched through various crosswalks on North Pleasant St. and Massachusetts Ave., bringing traffic to a standstill. The marchers walked through the Whitmore Administration building and delivered several hundred letters to Chancellor John Lombardi in support of GEO's demands.

GEO is also planning a number of other demonstrations to be carried out in classes and throughout campus.

"We have faculty support that allows us to speak to classes about Chancellor Lombardi's plan and the general attacks on diversity and educational access and also the details of our contract campaign. Just informing students to what's going on and how they can get involved."

"We've already begun planning events that would make it impossible for the University to run everything as they would like to. These demonstrations will continue until the university begins treating their graduate employees fairly. We have already run "flying pickets" in which we go into buildings for brief periods of time to be very visible and disruptive. Class-rooms. Libraries. Cafeterias."

GEO has also organized a boycott of classes on April 21. The boycott would include GEO members as well as UMass students.

"This act isn't a rejection of our faculty, whom we greatly respect," said Murr. "It's a rejection of an administration who won't prioritize students, teachers and textbooks. By going to class, we pretend that the assault on student and employees rights isn't happening. By not going to class, we resist and say we won't fulfill UMass' expectations until they start to fulfill our expectations for a fair labor contract, for student autonomy and support for diversity."

Although there is obvious conflict between the University and GEO, Murr believes there is still hope for an agreement between both sides.

"We still meet with them every Friday. I have hope that we will force them to give us the fair contract that we deserve," said Murr. "We do an enormous amount of teaching and work that happens at UMass. We're a big reason why the level of under-graduate education is so high and why UMass holds the level of prestige that it does. Because we are such an important group on campus and because our members are increasingly willing to act to make sure we are treated correctly, I believe a deal will eventually be reached."

Hundreds march on campus last week protesting the ongoing dispute between GEO contracts and the UMass administration.

Saviano exposes clergy sex abuse scandal and sues

1997 that Saviano turned towards public activism and founded the New England chapter of Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests.

Saviano went through life up until 1992 thinking that Holley had been caught. Then one morning while reading the Boston Globe, he read about two victims of clergy-abuse who went public—victims of David Holley.

"That was my life changing moment, when I saw the article in the Globe about the two were who were molested in the 1970s," explained Saviano.

At this point, the public exposure began. Saviano hired Boston attorney Eric MacLeish and filed the first priest-abuse lawsuit in Massachusetts against the Worcester diocese. The Worcester diocese offered Saviano $15,500 if he signed a confidentiality agreement— a legally binding document. His lawyer threatened to resign from the case because Saviano refused to sign it.

"I couldn't talk to news media, couldn't share experiences with a support group. I couldn't even talk to my friends about it," said Saviano. He felt abandoned by the diocese and his lawyer. He was even encouraged to plead guilty and to claim he had never met Holley's other victims. Saviano began a short correspondence with the imprisoned Holley, who was locked up in New Mexico, after receiving a 275-year sentence.

"I didn't get the answers I was looking for, so settled with the court instead of going to trial," Saviano explained. What he did get from the letters however, were merely "priestly sentiments." The lawsuit was filed in May of 1993, in order for Saviano to get access to the priest's records, and was settled in April of 1996. Saviano became the first victim who was able to settle a clergy-abuse lawsuit without signing a confidentiality agreement.

He proceeded to call the Boston Globe to diffuse his story through the public. He then had to face his family. He told his three brothers and father his story on a Sunday, the day before the story ran in the Globe. At this time, Saviano's mother had already passed away. His father "was angry and accused me of bringing the scandal to our hometown," recalls Saviano.

Six weeks later, on February 1, 1993 another story and photograph covering Saviano ran on the front page of USA Today. "The issue is like quicksand," he compared. International news media began to pursue Saviano and he declined an invitation to go on Good Morning America.

Saviano founded the New England chapter of SNAP, which is a national organization that began in 1990 in Chicago. Today there are over 50 chapters. Saviano maintains the organization's website, snapnetwork.org.

"It is possible to heal. Part of the process is to verbalize with other survivors. Your experience which was so consuming may not have been so unique after all," explained Saviano.

His reply to thoughts about the Catholic Church was, "I'm going to choose my words carefully, something you can print," Saviano said chuckling.

"Church has missed many opportunities to make the world a better place to live in. It's not a friend to women or to gays in society. It doesn't have a positive legacy in the way it's treated children. It's done a lot of good in the world, but there's so much more it could be doing," Saviano said.

The event was presented by the Everywoman's Center Rape Crisis and Violence Prevention Programs, the Men's Resource Center and the UMass Stonewall Center.

Cardinals to begin secret process of choosing Pope

The unanimous vote Saturday by 130 cardinals to maintain public silence about John Paul's successor was unprecedented. But in an era of continuous news updates and constant speculation, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls called the media ban an "act of responsibility."

He asked journalists not to ask the cardinals for interviews and said they should not take the prelates' silence as an act of "discourtesy."

"The cardinals, after the funeral Mass of the Holy Father, began a more intense period of silence and prayer, in view of the conclave," Navarro-Valls said. "They unanimously decided to avoid interviews and encounters with the media."

At least two cardinals later turned down requests for interviews.

The lack of access to the cardinals was unlikely to stem the speculation about John Paul's successor, with worldwide interest peaking in what could be a tight competition between reformers and conservatives.

Navarro-Valls said 115 prelates will participate in the conclave, which will begin April 18 — all the cardinals under the age of 80 except for Cardinal Jaime L. Sin of the Philippines and Cardinal Alfonso Antonio Suarez Rivera of Mexico, who are too sick to attend.

John Paul took the name of an additional cardinal — kept secret apparently to protect him from a government that represses religious activity — to the grave.

Cardinal Karl Lehmann was quoted by the German newspaper Allgemeine Zeitung as saying race and background will play a role in the choice of the next pope, but there were no clear favorites and "probably also no firm alliances."

"One must be moved through voting, contacts and discussion to a consensus," he was quoted as saying.

John Paul was the first non-Italian pope in 455 years. Some cardinals have called for a Latin American pope to reflect the huge number of Catholics in the region. Others have said the papacy should return to an Italian, while there are contenders from elsewhere in Europe, as well as from Nigeria and India.

St. Peter's Square, which was packed during the funeral by 250,000 pilgrims and dignitaries from 138 countries, was quiet a day later under a steady rain. Cafes and souvenir shops along nearby Via della Conciliazione reopened, finally freed of the crush of pilgrims.

"I can't talk to you," said a man hawking religious trinkets, key chains and figurines. "After 10 days without work, every second counts."

The exodus of pilgrims was wrapping up Saturday as visitors carrying backpacks, folded flags and rolled-up sleeping bags headed for train stations and parking lots on the outskirts of the city. Few stayed around to see the sights.

"We have come here only to pray," said Ula Maciejowska, 33, who was heading home to Oswiecim, Poland. "We will come another time to shop."

Rome's Mayor, Walter Veltroni, said Rome's population of 2.6 million doubled over the past week, giving a lower figure than earlier police estimates of 4 million visitors. He said 1.3 million people filed past John Paul's body.

Remarkably, the mayor said not a single incident of purse-snatching or theft was reported from Vatican City, the diminutive state that in 2002 was reported to have the highest crime rate in the world, mostly incidents such as pickpocketing.

He said Rome's main train station and the square at Tor Vergata University, where John Paul held a huge Youth Jubilee in 2000, will be renamed after the late pope.

People to protest church closings chairman Peter Borre said of O'Malley's top deputies, including Bishop Richard Lennon.

The council, a lay group, celebrated a "Mass of solidarity" Sunday at the Infant Jesus-St. Lawrence Parish in Brookline, one of the seven parishes where members are holding 24-hour vigils.

After the Mass, which wasn't sanctioned by the archdiocese, council members gathered in front of reporters to respond to O'Malley's decision to reverse the closing of St. Albert the Great in Weymouth.

O'Malley also announced last month that St. Anselm church in Sudbury will reopen as a chapel and celebrate a regular Sunday Mass.

Cynthia Deysher, a council co-chair, said she and other St. Anselm parishioners are grateful, but they won't end their vigil until they know the details of O'Malley's plan to reopen the church as a chapel affiliated with a Framingham parish.

"Some of it requires faith, but that's what Catholics are used to," she said.

About a year ago, O'Malley announced plans to close almost a quarter of the archdiocese's 357 parishes. He attributes the need for church closings to a shortage of priests, changing demographics and a financial crisis brought on in part by the cost of clergy sex abuse lawsuits.

Archdiocese spokeswoman Kelly Lynch said Sunday that O'Malley knew his decisions "would not please all people affected by them."

"It remains the hope of the Archdiocese that these vigils conclude peacefully," Lynch added in a prepared statement.

O'Malley based his decision to reopen St. Albert and St. Anselm on a recommendation by a church reconfiguration committee he formed.

Council members urged O'Malley to expand that committee's role in guiding the church closing process.

"Expand this committee to bring in Boston's real Catholics, people who have kept their faith while losing their trust during the terrible years of (Cardinal Bernard Law)," Borre said.

Warren Hutchison, a parishioner at Infant Jesus-St. Lawrence, said his parish is "fighting a battle of numbers" because it isn't as large as St. Albert.

But the Brookline parish is financially sound and isn't costing the archdiocese any money, he argued.

"We simply want an opportunity to bring parishioners back in the pews," he said.

St. Albert's parishioners plan to end their vigil once their church officially reopens. Mary Akoury, who co-chairs St. Albert's parish council, said O'Malley's decision to reopen her church doesn't change her view that the process is flawed.

"Vibrant, thriving parishes were closed," she said.

"Our heart goes out to those that continue to be in vigil. We know the pain that they are feeling."

Borre said council members waited until Sunday to hold their press conference out of respect for Pope John Paul II, whose funeral was Friday.

UMass-Boston needing repairs

BOSTON — Officials at the University of Massachusetts at Boston say the campus parking garage needs $50 million in repairs, or else there is a risk of structural failure in 10 years.

The 640,000 square-foot parking garage also serves as the foundation for five of the seven buildings at the UMass-Boston campus. Officials are concerned that deterioration of the garage threatens those buildings as well.

Inside the garage, wooden posts help shore up the supports. Nets hang from the ceiling to catch loose pieces of concrete from falling on cars and pedestrians.

Campus officials say the garage was poorly designed and built and is also sustaining damage from being in a saltwater environment.

The campus, built on a former landfill facing Dorchester Bay, was designed as a single megastructure, its foundation made of concrete slabs inlaid with steel rods.

Ellen O'Connor, the university vice chancellor for administration and finance, said the concrete was of a lower quality than it should have been, and the steel bars were placed too close to the surface. As a result, the concrete has crumbled more quickly than expected and the steel has been exposed to the elements.

The university is closely monitoring the condition of the garage and would stop using buildings before there were any risk of collapse, and the structures would be demolished before they failed, O'Connor said. She said the campus is still safe.

The opening of a new $75 million campus center on the UMass-Boston campus has provided students and staff with a stark contrast to the poor condition of the garage. The new building "sets a standard of beauty and usefulness, and it's whetted appetites for what the rest of the place could be like," O'Connor said.

Boykin dismisses common myths during Gaypril event

King treated the down low as though it was a new issue. Men having sex with other men even while they are in relationships with women has been happening for a long time. Boykin used Alexander the Great, who was married, and his lover Hephastion as an example. "The only thing new about the down low is what we call it."

Boskin also stated that being on the down low was "not a Black thing." The governor of New Jersey, a man with a wife and children, has come out of the closet, said Boykin. "The governor was white and the governor was on the down low. The difference is, when white men do it, we move on.

When black men do it, we want to analyze it to see what is wrong with the black community."

Another misconception that Boykin says King's book perpetuated, is that the down low is "a gay thing." Men who cheat on their girlfriends/wives with other women are on the down low too, Boykin pointed out several examples of this found in songs, such as Brian McKnight's "On the Down low," which is about him cheating on his girlfriend with another woman.

"So we had all these references throughout the nineties, and we laughed about these infidelities. Then we found out gays were doing the same thing and suddenly we became alarmed.

"The down low became an excuse for the AIDS epidemic among African-Americans."

Boykin said that, if the down low was to blame for AIDS, then why has it only caused concern so recently, rather than when the AIDS epidemic was at its peak.

People on the down low do not cause AIDS, said Boykin. "In order to pass on the HIV virus, you need to first be infected with the HIV virus." Boykin also told that black women with AIDS were surveyed and only 1.6 percent of them cited sex with a bisexual as a possible reason for infection.

The real problem with the misinformation that King has provided, said Boykin, is that it has been spread by the media and is now perceived to be the truth.

"One man's misinformation has managed to create a media frenzy....It was an easy story that demonizes black men and stigmatize black women," he said.

The idea that the down low is such a major reason for AIDS is also dangerous, said Boykin. "Black women are being taught that if they spy on their lovers and look out for the down low, that they will be safe." The idea that stopping the down low will stem the AIDS epidemic, is distracting us, said Boykin, from programs that really could help prevent HIV infection.

Restoring one man's legacy

Matthew Reid

Back in 2000, ESPN released its list of the 100 greatest North American athletes of the past century. The list was impressive, topped by the likes of Michael Jordan, Babe Ruth and Wayne Gretzky.

The list contained seven boxers, including Muhammad Ali, at the third position.

Buried at the very bottom, in one hundredth place, was Jack Johnson.

For his career, Johnson compiled a 79-8 record with 46 knockouts. He could have been of those special few who, despite playing so long ago, go down in history as one of the all-time greats in his respected sport, like Ty Cobb did in baseball, or Red Grange did in football.

However, history has all but forgotten the name Jack Johnson. Why? Simple. He was a victim of circumstance. The circumstance being he was black.

Johnson is sometimes referred to as the "other Jackie" to break the color barrier in sports. In 1908, almost 40 years before Jackie Robinson broke into the major leagues, Johnson became the first black heavyweight champion of the world when he soundly defeated Tommy Burns in 14 rounds.

Granting a presidential pardon wouldn't erase the decades of disgrace that this country has placed upon Johnson's career as a boxer and life as a human being, but it would be progress.

The son of former slaves, Johnson dealt with racial struggles his entire life. Some say Burns wouldn't even have fought a black contender if it weren't for the fact that he was guaranteed $30,000 to large purse back then) to do so. His most publicized fight was against Jim Jeffries, a former heavyweight champion who sportswriters re-ferred to as "The Great White Hope."

Johnson lived a flamboyant life, filled with fast cars, loud music (he played in his own jazz band), a Hollywood-style entourage and lots and lots of women. It was the last one that got him into so much trouble.

In 1913, at the height of his career, Johnson was convicted under the Mann Act for transporting his white fiancee across state lines. According to the United States Department of Justice, the Mann Act, enacted in 1910, prohibited the "transport of females across state lines for immoral purposes." Its primary intent was to "address prostitution and immorality."

Johnson's fiancee, Lucille Cameron, worked as a brothel. Johnson was taking her away from the brothel at the time he was caught by police. The Mann Act was put in place to address the issues of prostitution and immorality in the country, but the fact that Johnson was the first to be convicted under it was no coincidence. Johnson was open about his preference for white women, and made it clear that he felt himself superior to the white heavyweight champs of the day. Many white men at the time, both in boxing and in general, thought he was a threat to society.

Did Johnson do anything wrong? That depends on how technical you want to be. At the time, the laws were clear, although they seem absurd by today's standards. But does Johnson deserve to have his legacy tarnished because of the backwardness of the generation he grew up in? Absolutely not.

Thankfully, steps are being taken to remedy the situation. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is leading an effort in Congress to pass legislation for a pardon for Johnson.

Last year, the Senate passed a version of the McCain bill, but the House did not vote on it. Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., is now pushing the House version of the bill, according to CBSnews.com.

In a letter to President George W. Bush pushing for the pardon, McCain wrote, "Johnson's conviction was motivated by nothing more than the color of his skin. It injured not only Mr. Johnson, but also our nation as a whole."

The issue over Johnson's potential pardon is not a partisan one, either. Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., D-Ill., and Democratic Massachusetts Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry also endorse the pardon. The same can be said for documentary filmmaker Ken Burns, a staunch opponent of the Bush Administration and the creator of the PBS film, "Unforgivable Blackness: The Rise and Fall of Jack Johnson."

Racial equality in the United States has come a long way since the days of Jack Johnson, both in terms of sports and in general. Black athletes, specifically, are prevalent in all major American sports. Most of us who watch sports regularly don't even register that an athlete is white or black when watching a game.

But when you think about it, making Johnson's pardon simply a "fight for African American equality" is only part of the issue. It is more than a black man being pardoned for an unjust conviction. It's about admitting the past wrongs of our country's legal system, and working towards the process of healing and forgiveness.

Granting a presidential pardon wouldn't erase the decades of disgrace that this country has placed upon Johnson's career as a boxer and life as a human being, but it would be progress. As Rep. Jackson put it, the pardon would "reaffirm America's dedication to fairness and justice for all." It would be the first step in restoring the legacy of one of the greatest heavyweight champions of all time. It would finally clear the name of someone whose name deserves to be cleared.

Matthew Reid is a Collegian columnist

Apathy on its way out

Becky Martins

Apathy is becoming a growing trend in today's world. Whether it is in regards to politics, current events or just concern for others, people are slowly losing interest in simply having interest at all.

As college students, we are of the age in which boundaries are pushed. We venture out for the first time and experience life solo. We find ourselves away from the watchful eyes of parents, teachers etc. and left to make our own decisions. One would think having such freedom would allow us to begin finding ourselves and shaping our own "person." However, many people seem indifferent to understanding life at a deeper level and remain stubborn to enlightenment or change.

Most commonly, individuals appear to be apathetic to the world around them. I even experienced this firsthand when trying to find a topic for this column. For inspiration, I asked my peers if they felt passionately about any current event occurring globally, nationally or locally. Yet I was met only with many versions of the same response: "I don't watch the news, read the newspaper, etc. so how would I know?"

It is disheartening to think people have no interest in what is happening around them, whether they are directly involved or not. Yes, we may feel unaffected in our UMass Amherst "bubble," but that is no excuse to forget about reality outside of it. At college, we are learning to become tomorrow's leaders, but this surely cannot be achieved if we do not look beyond our own problems.

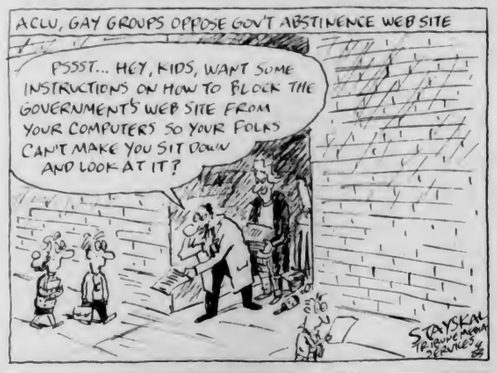
What is even sadder of a realization is that this extreme lack of concern is affecting younger generations. Upon going home for Spring Break, I visited my old AP English teacher from high school and spoke to his current class about college life. At first, the question/answer session went well, but then a comment was made that was shocking. One of the students randomly spoke up halfway through our meeting, saying, "You know what I hate, people who are into politics."

At first, all I could do was remain speechless, trying to comprehend that someone could think, let alone verbalize, such an idea. I tried to stress the importance of standing for something to the class, hoping no one else thought similarly. But essentially, the question of "Was this girl an exception or did more people actually think similarly?" was on my mind the rest of the day.

At college, we are learning to become tomorrow's leaders, but this surely cannot be achieved if we do not look beyond our own problems.

Apathy, however, also extends beyond not watching the news, hating politics, etc. Though it is becoming increasingly better, some individuals still have a lack of concern for their peers and problems they face. As made evident this fall, UMass has work to do in uniting its student body regarding racial, religious and lifestyle differences. Incidents that occurred on campus have driven some people apart and made it an even harder task of gaining campus-wide acceptance.

But if people tried to relate to others, though they may not be able to fully, would there be such ill will? Obviously, the world is not a perfect place and issues will always exist among people. However, fewer of them would remain today if they had not occurred at all. Too often, when someone cannot "understand" where another person is coming from, they ignore the potential severity of a situation.



The other individual's problems become insignificant. Those affected are thought to be simply "overreacting." But if this indifference was lifted and people showed true concern and desire to help their peers, the world would be a more positive place. Fewer problems would be created, those existing would be mended and there could be hope for a better future.

In essence, it is time people have an opinion but remain open-minded to other ideas. We should be both aware and involved in the world around us, since one day we will be in charge of it. For if we are not, how can we possibly function successfully within it?

Thus, my advice to everybody is to step up and truly become a "member" of society. Politics may not be the most interesting of subjects, but learn where you stand. Current events may not always prove exciting, but be aware. We, as people, may have differences but also realize we have many common points, as well.

As former NFL Quaterback Steve Bartkowski once said, "If you don't stand for something, you'll fall for anything."

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

GOING TO COLLEGE FOR FREE?

As a college student, it is difficult and even daunting to think about where you'll end up when your four years at UMass are finally over. Perhaps you will continue your education and obtain a master's or a PhD. Or maybe you'll put down the books for good and join the work force.

Whatever you decide to do, it's almost a guarantee that you (and nearly all your fellow classmates) will be in debt and paying off loans for years. In the 1999-2000 school year, 64 percent of students nationwide were handed their diplomas with average debts of approximately $17,000.

The cost of public higher education is becoming a huge issue for lower and middle class students. Here at UMass Amherst, the costs for in-state students alone have skyrocketed to a dizzying 50 percent increase in the last five years.

The empty seats next to you that were once filled may not be a sign of a lazy classmate, but instead could be one that was forced to drop out of school because he or she could not afford the steep financial stresses that current public higher education had placed upon them.

This vital issue, however, is not without a feasible solution. Education is a fundamental right, and should therefore be made available to all those who seek to obtain it, regardless of economic background or class. The foremost question is "how is this accomplished?" And the answer is simple and often overlooked: make it free.

Most people would now say, "well someone has to pay for this." Yes, this fact is unavoidable. The federal government would be responsible for this aspect of the equation.

In 2001 the tuition and fees for four-and two-year institutions were about $32 billon. So how could Uncle Sam pay for our educations when the total cost is a number like that?

A perfect example of the solution is the post-WWII G.I. Bill. This Bill paid for all higher education for eight million veterans, and was extremely successful. A similar plan to make all public higher education free could also be possible if the federal government took certain steps.

A reduction in military spending by a small fraction, a repeal of Bush's tax cuts to the upper one percent of the United States population, or the elimination of corporate tax loopholes are all separate ways that the 32 billion dollars for free public higher education could be obtained. Each suggestion by itself would be more than enough to finance the endeavor.

If an idea like "free college" is such a good idea, then why hasn't anyone been doing anything about it? Across the country there is a national effort to make this goal possible. Here in the Bay State, the Massachusetts Free Higher Education Campaign is working for you and your classmates, as well as for future public college/university students. You may not know it, but this campaign is also alive and well here on the UMass campus.

On Wednesday April 13, there will be a public hearing on the Crisis in Higher Education and about the Free Higher Education Campaign itself. Students and community members will be reading their own testimonials about their struggles with the cost of public higher education. This will be followed by a discussion of the Free Higher Education Campaign with a panel of local legislators and professors. The event takes place at 4:30 p.m. in the Graduate Student Lounge, in the Campus Center. Keep your schedules clear and your eyes open for this important event.

Caterpillar's danger in the middle east

Ramzi Kanazi

Wednesday, April 13 has been declared the International Day of Action Against Caterpillar. I have spoken about Caterpillar, Inc. in a previous column concerning divestment from Israel. This company has been selling bulldozers to the state of Israel and the Israel Defense Forces since 1967 and in recent years, has undergone significant criticism for continued, direct sales and leasing of their equipment to the state. Several law firms have filed a joint lawsuit against the company.

Caterpillar's website claims that it "strives to meet the responsibilities of global citizenship." In their code of conduct, they state, "Wherever we conduct business or invest our resources around the world, we know that our commitment to financial success must also take into account social, economic, political and environmental priorities."

So why is Caterpillar being criticized and sued? Their business practices seem to run contrary to their statements. Several human rights groups, including Amnesty Inter-national and Human Rights Watch, have alerted Caterpillar, at least since 1998, affirming that the use of their equipment is in contradiction to international law. As early as 1989, the United Nations condemned house demolitions conducted by Israel, which were then recognized as being in violation of international law. Israeli soldiers used Caterpillar bulldozers to demolish those houses.

Again, the problem with Caterpillar stems from its negligent sales to Israel. The company sells bulldozers that are or can easily be armored and equipped for the purpose of wreaking havoc on Palestinians and their homes.

According to one of the firms filing a lawsuit against Caterpillar, The Center for Constitutional Rights, the suit is being filed "on behalf of the parents of Rachel Corrie, the 23-year-old American peace activist and student who was run over and killed by a Caterpillar D9 bulldozer on March 16, 2003." Soldiers intentionally crushed a young woman who was trying to prevent a Palestinian pharmacist's house from being demolished.

She stood in front of it waving her hands while wearing a bright orange top. Two soldiers operated the bulldozer; one was "spotting." The bulldozer then pushed a pile of debris on her legs, trapping her. A number of non-violent protestors yelled and screamed, alerting the bulldozer operators that she could not move, but the machine consequently ran over the young student with it's blade down and did so a second time in reverse. Rachel was pronounced dead shortly thereafter.

The Israeli government and the IDF engage in operations that would make a suicide bomber blush. Because this incident involved a young American peace activist, Caterpillar was notoriously thrust into the media over two years ago. The fact that soldiers used its equipment in numerous human rights violations prior and would continue to use it in this manner was clearly illustrated to the company. Caterpillar must now contend with a lawsuit.

Since 1967, over 10,000 Palestinian homes have been destroyed. The government of Israel routinely engages in collective punishment, destroying the homes of suspected combatant's families. Many of the alleged are not even the terrorists that Israel surmises. The fourth Geneva Convention prohibits collective punishment, and the international community has criticized Israel for this.

Again, the problem with Caterpillar stems from its negligent sales to Israel. The company sells bulldozers that are or can easily be armored and equipped for the purpose of wreaking havoc on Palestinians and their homes. Just as organizations that endorse Palestinian militant groups have their assets frozen and undergo investigations, companies that support Israeli state-sponsored terror must be held accountable.

A city in Ireland may soon vote to become the first Caterpillar Free Zone. According to Electronic Intifada, a leading online portal covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Limerick City's "motion calls on the City Council to ban the use of all Caterpillar plant and machinery on Council worksites from Jan. 1, 2006, and calls on all traders in Limerick City to implement a voluntary ban on the sale of Caterpillar merchandise."

A number of U.S. cities, including Santa Cruz, CA, have passed resolutions supporting House Concurrent Resolution 111, which calls upon the U.S. government to investigate the death of Rachel Corrie. We should take it further and follow the lead of Limerick City, encouraging our legislators to work for the establishment of Caterpillar Free cities in the U.S. as well. Organize meetings in your town to support similar measures. Call or write your state representatives. Do something on campus. (After watching what's going on with Chancellor Lombardi and Vice Chancellor Gargano, it might be easier to do something where you can actually make a difference. You know: start with less authoritarian regimes.)

I explains that Caterpillar shareholders will meet to discuss a "resolution on the sale of bulldozers to Israel" in two days — April 13 — the International Day of Action Against Caterpillar. Now is the time to flood the company with letters and emails urging it to stop aiding illegal home demolitions. Human Rights Watch has sample letters that people can use when writing to Caterpillar.

It's time that we in America apply our moral standards universally. If we choose to impose sanctions against our "enemies" for their rogue actions, then we should discourage similar behavior from those, which we claim as allies. Help stop Caterpillar now.

'Spawning' a nation of comic book fans

Campus Collectors

By Mackenzie Issler
Collegian Correspondent

Wednesdays are a key day in the life of a comic book collector. On this day, new issues hit the shelves in comic book stores across the country.

Robert Grover, a resident of Amherst, and a UMass alum, has been running comic book stores for the past six years. Presently, he works at Sidekicks Inc in Hadley, Mass.

According to Grover, anywhere from 50 to 100 people go to his store on Wednesdays. The customers range from children to the elderly. "My oldest customer is 72," he said. He, himself, has been collecting since 1974.

Graham Jorge, a junior Communications major at UMass, is a dedicated comic book collector. In his ideal world, he would be able to buy comic books every Wednesday, but like most college students, money is scarce.

Much of Jorge's day revolves around comic books. If he is not reading one, he is on a message board of his favorite comic book writer, Brian Michael Bendis, discussing the latest in the realm of comic books. "I get into my own world when I am reading any book, but especially so with comics," he said.

"Powers" by Brian Michael Bendis and "Y The Last Man" by Brian K. Vaughn are two of Jorge's favorite comic book series.

"Powers" is not your typical superhero comic, according to Jorge. The main protagonists in this comic are two detectives who deal with superpower related homicides. "It is not about the capes, it is more of a crime drama," he said.

"Y The Last Man" is about a boy named York, and his monkey Ampersand. These two are the only surviving males after a plague occurred and killed everything with the Y chromosome.

Jorge had his first experience with comic books when he was ten-years-old. His mother, a registered nurse, would buy him packs of comic books from the nearest Cosco. The pack would contain various comic books.

"She bought them for me to keep me busy, so I would be quiet and not complain when we were driving, and when we were going to one of my brother's soccer games," said Jorge.

"Spawn" was the first comic book that Jorge actively followed. He fell out of comic books for a couple years. "I was just really broke, and I was playing a lot of soccer," explained Jorge. In college, a senior English major gave him a comic book to read, and this rekindled his passion for comic books. Currently, he owns thousands of comic books, all of which are bagged and boarded, in comic book boxes under his dresser. His collection keeps growing, because the stories continue on.

Comic book collecting is

Is collecting an addicting practice?

very addicting. The stories are very engaging and interesting. A collector has his or her initial experience with comic books, and it exposed to a world that they did not know existed. The collector keeps going make for more, so he or she can finish the story.

Comic book collecting is not simply about following the latest superhero and villain. Comic books contain elaborate storylines, complemented with beautiful art work. From their inception, comic books were never meant for kids. It is has always been a medium that deals with adult issues.

There are comic books of every genre. There are horror comics. There are comic books about living life in modern day society and dealing with relationships and failures. There are comic books about the insecurities about being teenager, voices cracks and all. There are comic books dealing with the hard issue of death. There are superhero comics.

"It is not just about capes, it is about individuals who have these outstanding powers," said Jorge. Some comic books take on very serious subject matter, such as the Holocaust and Middle Eastern relations. No matter what you are looking for, a story exists about what you want in comic book form.

Comic books do not just depend on the written word. The written word is complemented beautifully with the artwork contained in its pages. These two work together to produce a story, both portrayed by word and visual art.

It is not an unusual sight to see Stephen Swift with a cigarette in on hand and a book in the other. An English major at UMass, had his first encounter with comic books, due to his father.

"He brought a big box down from the attic when I was four or five, and I got hooked," said Swift.

At a young age, Swift was attracted to comic books because of their visual nature. He liked the sequence of pictures, and the combination of colors. Now, he has learned to appreciate the way the narrative is produced through the symbiosis of text and the visual element.

Rather than releasing the story in single issues over the course of months, the graphic novel contains the entire story in one large text. Swifty, as friends call him, said "That might just be because keeping with the series makes me crazy...I like to devour what I read, not wait a week or two for the next installation," he said.

Swift likes to evaluate the different literary and visual elements of the graphic novel. He evaluates the literary elements, such as foreshadowing and the different themes present in the novel. He also gives attention to the visual aspects, such as the use of color and the repetition of symbols, both literary and visual.

"Jimmy Corrigan's The Smartest Guy on Earth" by Chris Ware is a favorite of Swift. It is his favorite to the extent that he wrote a 15-page paper defending it. It is a graphic novel that spans three generations of men in the Corrigan family in Chicago, Illinois.

Comic book collecting is not just a male dominated-hobby. Presently, the rising groups of consumers are teenage girls that are attracted to manga. Manga is a Japanese style of comic. They are short little books, with their own unique visual style.

A fantasy enthusiast and admirer of manga, Bethany Sherwood is a junior English major at UMass. Three years ago, her interest in manga was sparked after seeing the movie, "Battle Royale." She then wanted to know about the manga that the movie was based on.

One of Sherwood's favorite manga series is "Uzumaki" by Junji Ito. This series is about a small coastal Japanese town that is overrun with spirals, and the spirals influence on its inhabitants. The spirals slowly possess or turn the people of this Japanese town mad.

"His (Junji Ito) work is classically illustrated, which makes his subject matter all the more jarring — at first, you're merely struck by how beautiful Ito's work is, and then you're caught off guard by what's occurring on the pages," she said.

Comics are a more accepted medium of storytelling now, than they once were. With the heightened presence of comics in the popular culture and success of movies like Spider Man, more people are being exposed to comics, increasing the number of readers. As so well put by Graham Jorge, "Give it a try before you knock it."

The illustration of Junji Ito has been the subject of much discussion amongst comic book fans as of late, including UMass students.

Teaching help from Archie and Batman

By Billy Defrain
Daily Nebraskan (U. Nebraska)

LINCOLN, Neb. – Rocco Versaci was looking for a new way to get students interested in literature.

Tapped to teach the English 270: Pop Literature class at Palomar College in San Marcos, Cal., Versaci said one of his biggest concerns was lighting student apathy toward literature.

So he gave his students comics.

And now, "I have students reading ahead and rereading. I have students coming up to me saying they're excited for the next reading."

The class was so successful that Versaci was able to create a new class at the college: Comics as Literature.

"People think of Archie and Batman ... it's really a much more complicated art and literary form than people give it credit for," Versaci said.

This semester the class — with consistently full enrollment — has two texts: "Watchmen," written by Alan Moore, and Issue 13 of the literary magazine "McSweeney's," devoted entirely to comics.

Versaci said part of why he likes teaching comics in class is to destroy people's stereotypes of the often-maligned medium, reminding his students that it wasn't too long ago film as an academic study wasn't accepted in the academic world.

And Versaci's not alone. Comic classes have surfaced across the country, but not always with ease. So the National Association of Comics Art Educators — a non-profit, comic advocacy group - was formed to help teachers promote not just comic literature but comic drawing classes as well.

"There's a lot of people that are teaching comics as studio classes and within English departments who teach comics as fiction," said Ben Towle, assistant director of NACAE.

"It can be a hard sell to a dean or a head of a department," Towle said, so the group created a Web site, Teachingcomics.org, as an online resource with academic papers on comics, syllabi, handouts and study guides for teachers wanting to start a comics class.

Just as the aim of a traditional literature class isn't necessarily to prepare students for a career in writing or publishing, comics are a means of building visual literacy, Towle said.

"I've found it's an easier sell to sort of affirm people's stereotypes ... it can be helpful to have a lot of comics that are similar to what you'd read in an English 101 class, books about normal people," Towle said.

Titles like "Ghost World" by Daniel Clowes and "American Splendor" by Harvey Pekar, given more attention from recent movie adaptations, exploit not the fantastic but the mundane, making comics a more accessible medium for some people — or at least less juvenile — than the stereotypical caped superheroes in tights.

The tricky part in getting teachers and administrators to open up to comics, Towle said, is that "comics as a medium are judged by its worst examples ... there's no escaping the fact that there's some bad stereotypes of comics, much of it well deserved ... but the fact that Danielle Steele writes novels doesn't mean you shouldn't read 'Great Expectations.'"

COURTESY FINE LINE FEATURES

Paul Giamatti starred in "American Splendor," the autobiographical film about the life of comic book creator Harvey Pekar.

"Not to say that 'Watchmen' is a bad book, but when you open it up it's a bunch of people in tights," Towle said. And for a faculty member proposing a comics class to a department chair, that's not always helpful.

Yet Versaci said he didn't have much difficulty in getting English 290: Comics as Literature approved. Neither did English graduate student Eric Sergeant when he proposed using "Watchmen" as text for an English 101 class here at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

Sergeant said the graphic novel seemed like an obvious choice for the class, which is centered on themes of playing god in literature.

"We're trying to show multiple levels. Comics are a good way to get people thinking like that, and 'Watchmen' has some great character development."

Sergeant likened a good comic to a good film, where the director has complete control of everything inside the frame.

"Every panel moves the story forward for a certain reason," Sergeant said.

But for teachers like Sergeant and Versaci, the most important thing is to get students thinking and reading about literature.

"A really talented artist and writer can combine a word and an image to create a new meaning in a completely different way," Versaci said.

New novel revisits Wolfman's 'Crisis'

By Bill Radford
The Gazette (Colorado Springs, Colo.)

It was an unparalleled crisis for DC Comics heroes _ and a must-read for comics fans.

In 1985, the 12-issue "Crisis on Infinite Earths" transformed the DC universe by eliminating the concept of multiple Earth's parallel worlds with different versions of DC's heroes.

In the process, some characters, such as Supergirl and Barry Allen, a.k.a. the Flash, were killed. Many more were simply wiped out of existence.

Whether the sprawling series by writer Marv Wolfman and artist George Perez achieved its goal of simplifying the DC universe is debatable. But its impact is undeniable.

Twenty years later, Wolfman is revisiting "Crisis" with a novel being released this month by ibooks.

But don't look for a simple novelization of the famed comic-book series.

"There was no reason to replicate in prose what was in the comic, so I had to come up with something that was far more interesting than that," Wolfman said in a phone interview from Tarzana, Calif.

The result is "very much a brand-new concept in many ways," he added.

The hook he found was to have the Flash narrate much of the story. In this case, dead men do tell tales. Though the Flash is killed off about halfway through the comic-book series, his ability to move through time means he could visit the story at any point, even events that happened after his death.

"I wanted to do a story about what it's like to actually be the character," Wolfman said. "These books are told at a distance, especially something like 'Crisis,' which had 400-something characters.

"But this, this is a very personal story. It's about Barry."

It's not just the Flash's point of view that is different. Although the major scenes from the comic-book series are still there, such as the death of Supergirl, Wolfman also added much new material.

The last time he had tackled a novel was 30 years ago, so he was a bit daunted by the challenge. "I really wanted to make sure it was well-written. A novel is more internal and more descriptive than a comic book. Comics visualize the story for you. Here I had to visualize it for readers who had never read 'Crisis.'"

You don't have to know decades of DC continuity to understand the novel, Wolfman said. "It's very much the type of story that someone brand new can enjoy."

Meanwhile, DC is building up to a new crisis, "Infinite Crisis," in the fall. The company is mum on the details, but the just-released "Countdown to Infinite Crisis," a tale encompassing much of the DC universe, makes clear that something big is in the works. As DC says, the clock is ticking.

It was recently announced that a film version of the DC Comics creation, Wonderwoman will soon be in the works.

WHO IS YOUR WONDER WOMAN?

Silver Pictures recently announced it had signed Joss Whedon, creator of "Buffy the Vampire Slayer," to write and direct a movie featuring DC Comics' Wonder Woman.

The movie looks to be in good hands. Whedon knows how to craft stories featuring strong women and he knows comics: Check out his topnotch writing on Marvel's "Astonishing X-Men."

So now the big question is: Who will play Wonder Woman? Whedon told TV Guide that casting is the furthest thing from his mind, but it's not too early to start speculating. A few years ago, my first and only choice would have been Catherine Zeta-Jones. I still wouldn't mind seeing the 35-year-old actress in the role if she can be torn away from those T-Mobile commercials but Whedon says he'll probably be looking for someone in her 20s.

Who's your choice? E-mail your casting suggestions to me at comics@Tgazette.com.

Minutemen topple St. John's

ECAC) were sparked by a tremendous effort by their freshman goalie, Dave Saccente, who made a career-high 18 saves, most of them coming in the highlight reel variety.

"He made so many point-blank saves," Morris said, "robbed me about two or three times, Jeff [Zywicki] two or three times, Geno [Tundo]. A lot of credit goes to their goalie. He played excellent."

"Anytime you make 18 saves in a game, regardless of what the score is, you did a great job," Cannella said. "He was solid in there. Obviously, he kept them in the game early, and throughout the game he was the reason why they were in the game."

St. John's also played a tough zone defense through periods in the game, particularly the first half, concentrating on eliminating UMass' inside offense that is so dangerous because of the cutters who have the ability to find holes and finish the ball off a pass.

"When they went to the zone that one time, they shut us down pretty good on it, and I don't know why they switched out of it because we weren't beating it," Zywicki said. "Their defense was keeping it inside and giving us the outside shots and making us beat our men. Eventually, once we figured it out, we got it done."

The Minutemen built a 5-1 lead with 2:09 to play in the first half, but goals by SJU's Tom Michaelsen and Justin O'Donnell – who scored four times in the contest – cut the edge to 5-3 heading into the half.

UMass came out of the gates scorching in the third quarter, though, using six consecutive goals from Tundo, Pat Larmon, Zywicki, Morris, Garber and Clay Stabert to push the advantage out to 11-3.

O'Donnell answered the call again and closed out the third period scoring with a goal at the :02 mark of the third frame to get the Red Storm within seven, but UMass notched the first three goals of the fourth quarter to give it a 14-4 lead.

Zywicki opened the run with his fourth goal of the game, then sophomore Mike Gangas and freshman Fred Federico each contributed with their first career goals to round out the Gorilla offense.

The Maroon and White scored the first two goals of the game off the sticks of Zywicki and Chris Doyle before O'Donnell got the Red Storm on the board with 4:9 seconds to play in the first quarter.

Goals by Morris, Brian Jacovina and Zywicki to open the second quarter gave the Minutemen a four-goal lead before St. John's trimmed the margin to two before halftime.

NOTES: UMass senior attackman Gene Tundo's goal at the 13:58 mark of the third quarter gave him his 100th career point. It only took him 72 seconds to score his 101st point, as he recorded an assist on Pat Larmon's goal, which gave UMass a 7-3 lead...

Minuteman defenseman Dan Whipple picked up a career-high eight groundballs. He had 17 on the season heading into the game, also his career total, as he didn't record any last year, his freshman campaign.

"Danny has been one of the hardest workers we have," Cannella said. "He's first to every meeting, every practice, every film session, first guy there all the time. It's not a coincidence why he's performing the way he is."...

The 1,506 fans who showed up at Garber Field on Saturday were a season-high through UMass' five home games. The previous high was 938 on March 19, a 12-5 UM victory over Brown. Last year's biggest crowd was on May 8, when 2,300 fans came out to watch UMass' season finale, a 9-6 upset over No. 10 Rutgers...

Red Storm freshman midfielder Justin O'Donnell scored twice in the waning seconds of the second and third quarters. He cut UMass' lead to 5-3 when he beat goalie Bill Schell with 2:4 seconds left in the first half, and he scored his third of the game and 16th of the year with 2:5 seconds to play in the third quarter...

This is the first edition of the St. John's men's lacrosse team since 1994, when the university dropped the program. The team was reinstated in 2003 when SJU axed football. Coach Rick Sowell spent all of 2004 recruiting before this season got underway. The Red Storm field 26 freshmen, and nine of them start.

UMass keeps on rolling

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Saturday's match was an epic four-hour battle between two very evenly matched tennis teams.

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (14-6 4-0 Atlantic 10) was finally able to exercise its Boston University demons, beating the Terriers (8-6) 4-3 Saturday in Amherst. In 10 previous meetings between the two schools, UMass was unable to register a victory in any of them. The series dates all the way back to 1978.

"Nobody beats UMass eleven times," UMass coach Judy Dixon proudly proclaimed.

Today is Senior Day in Amherst as the Minutewomen take on Holy Cross (4-9) at the Upper Boyden Courts.

The deciding point could not have been any more dramatic for the Minutewomen, which came from sophomore Michele Spiess in the No. 1 singles slot. Spiess defeated BU freshman Gina Sabatino 6-1, 6-7 (6-8), 6-3, in a match that lasted nearly two and a half hours.

Spiess and Sabatino were very evenly matched all throughout the entire match. In the second set Sabatino battled from behind to force a tie breaker and ultimately took the set.

Twice in the third set Sabatino was down to match point but kept battling and pushed Spiess until the very end. Determined to win the match for her team, Spiess buckled down and closed the door on Sabatino and the rest of the Terriers.

By the closing games of the third set, Sabatino was visibly exhausted but Spiess showed no ill effects of the long match.

"From match one until now, Michele has never wavered and her record speaks to that," Dixon said. "She's tough as nails and a really good competitor."

Dixon also had nothing but high praises for the performance of Sabatino.

"She was amazing," Dixon said. "She was down luv-40, she was down match point twice and each time she got more aggressive and took more chances."

The turning point of the match against BU came with the victory of senior captain Sasha Edelstein in the No. 3 tilt. Edelstein defeated junior Aimee Charest 2-6, 6-0, 6-1.

"Sasha is the emotional leader like I say all the time," Dixon said. "When she turns it around you can hear her and you can feel her and the team starts to ride on that. When she started to play well in the third set you could feel everybody really starting to lift."

All season long Edelstein has been the catalyst for the Maroon and White and she showed why on Saturday.

After getting dominated in the first set, Edelstein looked to be down and out but came out in the second set on fire. The rest of the match she outplayed and outwitted Charest in route to the victory.

Also picking up singles points for UMass were freshman Masha Pozar and junior Jana Bartoloni. In the No. 2 singles Pozar defeated BU sophomore Erin Katims in straight sets 6-1, 6-1.

"Masha has been playing well for the last four or five matches and her confidence is up," Dixon said.

ANDREW TABLEMAN/COLLEGIAN

The UMass women's tennis team defeated Boston University for the first time in 10 meetings.

Bartoloni competed in her usual No. 6 slot on Saturday. She was also able to beat her opponent, junior Cheri Lapane, in straight sets 6-2, 6-3.

Dropping their matches for the Minutewomen were juniors Dorothy Iwanowicz and Susan Johnson.

Iwanowicz lost to freshman Katarina Draganova in straight sets 4-6, 0-6 while competing in the No. 4 slot. The entire match Iwanowicz was visibly frustrated, throwing her racket down between each game.

Johnson's No. 5 match was one of three singles matches that went all three sets. Terrier junior Monica Shepherd defeated Johnson 3-6, 6-2, 4-6.

"Susan played a very good match that could have gone either way," Dixon said. "She broke her only other racket in the third set so she wasn't even able to finish the match with her own racket."

For the first time in eight matches the Minutewomen weren't able to pick up the doubles point.

"We lost the doubles point which is difficult for us," Dixon said. "We rely on that doubles point."

The lone doubles victory came from the No. 1 duo of Johnson and Iwanowicz. The two were able to defeat the team of junior Laura Ahmes and Katims by a score of 8-6.

The match was very close the entire time. Iwanowicz and Johnson did struggle at one point losing five straight games.

Losing at No. 2 were Spiess and Pozar by a count of 8-5. Edelstein and Bartoloni also lost in the No. 3 slot, 8-5.

On Friday the Minutewomen extended their winning streak to six matches defeating Quinnipiac 6-1 in Hampden, Conn.

Picking up singles victories for the Minutewomen were Spiess, Pozar, Edelstein, Iwanowicz in the No. 1-4 slots respectively. Bartoloni also picked up a win in the No. 6 position.

UMass swept the doubles matches to pick up the point for the seventh straight match. Victors included Iwanowicz and Johnson at No. 1, Spiess and Pozar at No. 2 and Bartoloni and Edelstein at No. 3.

The Minutemen responded in the fourth when senior Derrick Durepo scored on a wild pitch after he singled to lead off the inning.

Duquense added an insurance run in the seventh to push the lead to 3-1.

In the bottom of the seventh, sophomore Anthony Santos reached base after being hit by a pitch. With a runner on first and down by two runs, senior outfielder Jason Twomley smashed a homerun over the right center fence in the bottom of the seventh to tie the game at three and send it into extra innings.

Twomley hit safely in all three games this weekend to extend his career-best hit streak to 11 games. Twomley went 4-for-12 on the weekend with two home-runs, five runs batted in and three runs.

"Twomley is playing very well and he is finally turning into the player I thought he could be," Stone said. "He's producing and hitting the ball when it matters. That's what we need more of and I wish people would feed off him a little bit."

Junior pitcher Matt Torra went ten innings, giving up three earned runs on 11 strikeouts before being replaced in the 11th. Junior David Sullivan then took the mound and gave up three runs, though only one was earned.

UMass could not respond and dropped the decision, 6-3. Torra now has a 1.50 ERA in seven starts with a 1-2 record. Adam Haun picked up the win for the Dukes, pitching the four extra innings and allowing just two hits.

"[Torra] was outstanding," Stone said. "He's been great every time and it's unfortunate that we can't get enough runs to help him. We should have won that ball game. When he goes out there, I expect to win."

In the second Saturday game, Duquense again got the board first when Grecco hit a solo homer over the right field fence.

UMass took the lead on Twomley's second homerun of the afternoon came in the second inning when he launched a 400-foot plus shot off the ice rink and gave UMass 4-1 lead. A wild pitch that scored freshman Brian Garrity made Twomley miss the grand slam by one pitch.

Duquense quickly responded with three runs off four hits to lead off the inning, including Morrison triple to right center to tie the game.

UMass's preparation.

"Yeah we watched films, I mean the girl's got 43 goals coming into this game so yeah we watched a lot of tape, we studied her and I pretty much knew her in and out," St. Hilaire said. "She only scored today from about eight meters, which is pretty good. I think I was well prepared for her and she's a phenomenal player, she's a freshman and she's already got 43 goals so she's obviously doing something right."

A less obvious hero of the game was sophomore defender Erica Shapiro who took control of her team's struggling transition game and single handily cleared the ball throughout the game. A frequent problem has been turnovers while clearing the ball, but Shapiro eliminated that flaw by securing the ball on both ends of the field.

"I think Erica Shapiro did a great job, she took the ball by the horns and ran the ball through the midfield probably 10, 15 times and she's so big, so strong, so confident out there, just wanting the ball, she knew what to do with it and was smart with it," UMass head coach Carrie Bolduc said. "Saint did a good job containing their freshman No. 20, Kath (Typudis) certainly put the ball away, you know everyone did a good job overall but Erica did a really nice job for us running through the midfield which is what we needed. It's almost like under pressure we tend to do better."

Any success the Minutewomen have had this year has been short lived though as they haven't won two consecutive games. The outcome looked hopeful for UMass on Sunday against Saint Joseph's as they came back from down three and scored five straight goals to take a 7-5 lead with 20 minutes left in the game. However, the Minutewomen failed to score again in the game and allowed the Hawks to score the game's last five goals.

Not coincidentally, UMass's senior leader St. Hilaire left the game for good as she hobbled off the field with 15 minutes remaining. From that point on the Minutewomen were outplayed by the Hawks' offense and had trouble gaining possession.

"It could have been, but you know you can just blame it on one person, I think other people can do her job just as easily so she's not our entire team," Bolduc said.

Kelley still focused on winning injury. In the games preceding her injury, Kelley had to make due with her lame foot, sometimes hobbling to first base and working through the injury. Sortino saw a big improvement in the practices leading up to the GW as Kelley proved her recovery when knocking the ball out of the park.

"It was great contact. That was a shot," Sortino said. "I was pleased to see her at the plate look like that. She really gave a great effort."

Kelley, along with her teammates, look at statistics and records as a unimportant facet of the game with one idea in mind: winning. After a collapse against Fordham a week ago, losing two games, and a 2-2 A-10 record, Kelley looked at the win against GW as an essential. Although she made history, it is the win that Kelley truly cared about.

"Whether it's the No. 1 team in the league or the last team in the league, it doesn't really matter," Kelley said. "Each team can win on any given day."

The record-tying homerun was part of a seven hit, eight run third inning for UMass that capped off the shutout. Senior pitcher Barb LaFogg was pleased with the performance by Kelley and is appreciative of the hitting job her teammates put out.

"I think it's absolutely great to have the team behind me scoring a lot of runs, where I could just worry about attacking the pitch," LaFogg said. "We were really fortunate that the team was hitting great in the first game."

With 26 homers accumulated over her career, Kelley is now just one away from standing alone in the record books. She is one of many players under Sortino that hold numerous records in both UMass and the Atlantic 10.

UMass rolls over St. John's

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

After St. John's rallied to score two goals in the final 76 seconds of the first half to cut the lead to 5-3, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella ripped into his team during intermission.

From there, his players responded with the first six goals of the third quarter to help dispose of the Red Storm by a score of 14-6 at Garber Field on Saturday.

UMass	14
SJU	6

The Minutemen (7-2 2-1 ECAC) take the field again when they travel to Hobart on Saturday to take on their newly added ECAC opponent.

Jeff Zywicki and Sean Morris once again paced UMass to victory, as Zywicki scored four times and Morris contributed with two goals and three assists.

Morris, who was recently added to the Tewaaraton Watch List and leads the team with 13 assists and 35 points, plus is tied with Zywicki for a team-high 22 goals, has notched eight assists in the last two games.

"My teammates are just getting open and finishing the ball," Morris said. "Before, [defenders] weren't sliding so fast, and I was just getting my shots off. Now, it's either I'll get [the shot] or I won't, and somebody will be open. I'm able to just dish the rock, and guys are finishing."

He also attributed the team's solid second half to Cannella's halftime speech.

"The coach really laid into us at halftime and really challenged us, and we were able to respond in the second half," Morris said. "I think we played well in the first half, but we just didn't finish our opportunities."

Minutemen fall at home to Duquesne

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team is still searching for an answer to its losing streak after dropping a pair of close games to Duquesne on Saturday, 6-3 in 11 innings and 6-5. But Sunday was a different story, as UMass was shut out 9-0 by the Dukes to conclude the weekend series at Earl Lorden Field.

Duquesne	6
UMass	3

Duquesne's weekend sweep pushes UMass' losing streak to 12 games. The Minutemen's next chance to break the streak comes when they host Connecticut at Earl Lorden Field Tuesday at 3 p.m.

"It's a game of streaks and we got to start on a different kind of streak," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I didn't expect this to happen. We're back at full strength and we expected to play better. I knew this year was going to be difficult, but I didn't think it would be this difficult.

"We just need to stay positive and play like we expect to win. We got to make breaks for ourselves. It's a struggle."

Duquesne benefited from seven unearned runs in the fifth and sixth innings on Sunday. The Dukes opened up an early 1-0 lead on UMass in the top of the first when junior Steve Maiolo's single that scored redshirt freshman Nolan Pena.

In the fifth, Duquesne broke the game wide open with five runs on two-out rally. Maiolo started the rally when he reached on an error by shortstop Bryan Adamski.

After two flyouts and sophomore Joe Erletic's double, freshman Dante Plassio reached on a walk to load the bases for freshman Patrick Kimutis, who singled down the right field line to drive in two runs. Pena followed suit by ripping a single through the left side to score Plassio from third. Freshman Eric Morrison then doubled down the left field to score both runners.

All five runs in the fifth were unearned due to Adamski's error. The Dukes added two more unearned runs in the sixth.

Demers was the losing pitcher in the effort, moving his record to 1-5 after giving six runs, with only one earned on 12 hits; he also struck out four. Redshirt freshman Jermey Gerger received the win after pitching five scoreless innings, allowing four hits and three walks.

In the first game on Saturday, Duquesne notched a run in the second and fourth inning to jump out 2-0.

Minutewomen sweep Colonials

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

It was a tale of two games that produced two different outcomes as the Massachusetts softball team (15-11-1 4-2 Atlantic 10) swept George Washington (8-20 3-3 A-10) in a doubleheader last Saturday at home.

The Minutewomen return to the field tomorrow when they play the University of Connecticut.

After a non-conference doubleheader last Wednesday in which the Maroon and White swept Maine, UMass proceeded to pickup where it left off.

Game 1 featured a lopsided score as UMass defeated GW 11-0, increasing its win-streak to four. The run scoring began right off that bat in the first inning, with the Minutewomen heating up early. Following a steal home by junior KJ Kelley, freshman Lauren Proctor singled to right field, driving senior Denise Denis in for the second run of the day. After a scoreless second inning, the Minutewomen ran up the score in the third, with virtually everyone in the lineup getting into the action. Proctor added to her first inning hit by bringing in two more scores with a RBI double to center field.

GW	1

"We hit the ball really well," senior Hilary Puglia said. "We know what we're capable of and we feel good about what we did."

With the game opening up for the Maroon and White, Puglia doubled, driving in junior Kristi Stefanoni and then Kelley produced two more runs as she homered to left field (her 26th home run of her career, which ties a school record). With the score at 11-0 after the third, the game was ended in the fifth inning due to the mercy rule (if a team is ahead by ten or more runs at the end of the fifth inning, the game is called). The 11 run differential was the biggest UMass has earned all season and the players were pleased with the win.

"It's a huge win, being 2-2. Every Atlantic 10 game from here on out is huge," Kelley said. "We're looking to dominate each and every one of those games to go to Rhode Island for that A-10 Championship."

Throughout the five innings, senior pitcher Barb LaFogg allowed one hit while striking out 11 batters. LaFogg (10-7) continues to add to her yearly strikeout count, which is now at an A-10 high 117 in her 18 appearances.

The second game of the day turned out to be a different story than the previous blowout. The hitting slowed down for UMass and the Colonials continued their offensive slump. Although the Minutewomen racked up 11 runs in the first three innings of Game 1, they went on to manage just one run throughout over six innings of Game 2. The only run was the result of a solo homerun by sophomore Amanda Morin, which was rocked over the right field fence.

"Well the pitcher didn't throw us very many strikes. I think we were just hanging around like we were going to see the same pitching we saw in the previous game where we saw a lot of strikes," Sortino said. "We were fortunate that Amanda put that ball out early and she got a hold of that pitch."

Defensively, the Maroon and White continued to grasp a one run lead as junior pitcher Jenna Busa, who recorded 10 strikeouts on the day, did not allow a single run or hit in the first five innings. Down by one with one inning left in the contest, GW managed to tie it up in the seventh with starting pitcher Gabby Culp singled, driving in the tying runner.

At the bottom of the seventh, Sortino hoped to break the deadlock. Morin led off, getting on base off of an error. Sortino made the decision to put pinch hitting sophomore Amanda Acampora in the lineup. The sophomore then advanced the runners, singling a grounder up the middle that the GW pitcher was unable to handle.

"Bringing in Acampora, who I think, if the ball's going to be on the plate, she's a good run and hit kind of person," Sortino said. "She did what she needed to do, put the ball on the ground. Coming in off of the bench, that was a huge hit."

With two on base, the rest was left up to Puglia, who then cranked out a linedrive to center field, giving UMass the win. Puglia had three hits and one RBI. In Game 2, while Morin's homerun was the first of her career. Holding the Colonials to one run the entire day, the Minutewoman defense felt proud of its accomplishment.

"Jenna pitched a good game, so it was good that we could get her some runs," Morin said. "I just thought we had to push back, they were coming at us and we had to push harder back at them."

With the down to the wire win, UMass adds to its 77 unbeaten games at the UMass Softball Complex and records its second straight doubleheader sweep.

Kelley ties school HR record

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Fans, players and coaches alike knew the day was going to come sooner or later.

Ever since junior catcher KJ Kelley recorded her fourth home-run of the season on March 6, the crowd hushed every time she stepped up to the plate, wondering if it would happen at that moment in time.

On Saturday, in an 11-0 blanking of George Washington, Kelley jogged up to home plate, and ended her 15-game homerun dry streak. As the ball cracked against her bat, it then rocketed over the scoreboard and into the parking lot behind the UMass Softball Complex. The homerun was her fifth of the season and the 26th of her career, which ties the all-time record at UMass.

"It really felt good for myself to have contact with the ball," Kelley said. "It was just a good feeling to see it going."

Although she uncharacteristically failed to homer over a span of more than a month, Kelley missed one game and played sparingly in another due to a right ankle injury that forced her to wear a brace. Prior to Saturday, Kelley led the team in slugging percentage with a mark of .617 and recorded a four homeruns on the season (tying a team high), but had not been hitting the long ball as much as she wanted.

"I've been struggling here as of late," Kelley said. "So it really felt good for myself to have contact with the ball."

UMass coach Elaine Sortino agreed that Kelley had not been making the contact on the ball before the win over GW, but attributed a lot of it to Kelley's

UMass splits A-10 weekend

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (4-7 1-1) began their Atlantic 10 section of the season this weekend by beating La Salle (6-6 0-1) 12-11 on Friday afternoon then gave up a two goal lead to Saint Joseph's (4-4 1-1) in the second half on way to losing 10-7.

The Minutewomen will return to action on Friday when they travel to Olean, New York to take on the 7-3 Bonnies of St. Bonaventure.

Saint Joseph's	10

Lindsay Cassel put away two goals against La Salle including the game winner with under two minutes left in the game. The Minutewomen then successfully ran out the clock without a mistake, an improvement for a team that has been inconsistent thus far.

The win kept UMass undefeated in Atlantic 10 openers and 7-0 against La Salle all-time. Freshman standout Kathleen Typadis, who is well on her way to setting the freshman scoring record for UMass, scored a career high five goals, putting her season total at 24 goals to go along with six assists. Kerri Connerty, who has 27 goals so far, added three against the Explorers and talked about the importance of finally winning a close game.

"This is the Atlantic 10's so we needed to come out strong, we had a tough schedule with a lot of top 20 teams, 15 teams so we needed to come out today and prove that playing all those teams was worth it," Connerty said. "They [tough games] taught us never to give up, which I felt was shown today specifically. We're fighters."

Another component of the win was senior captain Kristin St. Hilaire's flawless defense on La Salle's outstanding freshman Emily Bonczek, who entered the game with an amazing 43 goals. Bonczek was held to three goals, all of which she had to work for due to

This semester the Advanced Promotional Strategies class offered by the University of Massachusetts School of Management is working with the New England Ford Dealers and the advertising agency JWT to promote the Ford Focus on campus.

The 20 students in the class have formed an actual marketing firm that they have named "Red Line Marketing." The students have complete creative control over the campaign, which will culminate in a large festival type event called Focus Fest '05 on April 19.

"We had to build a marketing campaign from top to bottom," said Alexandra Weltman public relations department head of Red Line Marketing. Weltman is a senior and one of the few communication majors in the class that mostly consists of marketing students.

Red Line Marketing, in addition to the public relations department, also has a research department, an events department, and a creative/media department, as well as a head coordinator.

Through this program students have been given the chance to "implement all the skills we have learned in our various courses because we have a real client and a real budget with real money" said Weltman.

Josh Fajardo, a member of the public relations department and a junior on the Red Line Marketing team said, "this is the closest thing I have to actual experience."

Members of the UMass School of Management's "Focus Fest '05" stand outside S.O.M. last Wednesday. The marketing class could receive a $3,000 prize for promoting the automobile.

Before the actual campaign was implemented, Red Line Marketing had to make a presentation to members of the New England Ford dealer's board of directors as well as members of JWT. "While we are the ones coming up with everything creatively," said Weltman, "everything does get run by [the board of directors and JWT]."

After the campaign has come to an end, Red Line Marketing will make another presentation, which will walk though the entire campaign from start to finish, highlighting everything that was done as well as the effectiveness of Focus Fest '05.

The partnerships between companies and students on college campuses are established by a company called EdVenture. The School of Management students at UMass are not the only students to be given this amazing opportunity. Six other schools in the New England are also part of EdVenture's program.

The school that is deemed to have the best campaign by the New England Ford Dealers and JWT will win $5,000, with the second place team winning $1,000. There are also scholarships and internships that individual students can apply for.

"[The campaign] is not really to make students buy the cars…just to get them thinking about it" said Fajardo.

The New England Ford dealers and JWT do not expect that Red Line Marketing and its counterparts on other campuses will actually convince students to go out and buy a Ford Focus. Their goal is to simply get college students to look at the Focus and to enhance its image.

In the past the advanced promotional strategies class, lead by marketing professor Kathleen Debevec, worked on ad campaigns for CitiBank, the GMC Jimmy and the Honda Element.

Israeli beatboxer to play at UMass

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

Yuri Lane, a human beatboxer, will be presenting in the Cape Cod Lounge on the University of Massachusetts campus at 7:30 p.m. tonight.

Lane is a human beatbox and vocal magician who presents, "From Tel Aviv to Ramallah," a hip travelogue of peace that weaves Palestinian and Israeli voices into a tapestry of the Middle East. He has lived on both sides of the 1967 Green Line, discovering the cultural divide between Israelis and Palestinians as well as the numerous commonalities of the two cultures. He brings the Middle East to life and the vision of Jewish-Arab co-existence through the hip-hop medium of beatbox combined with acting and dance.

This program is the second part of a three-part "Radical Conversation Series," Ruthie Oland, a member the Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow at the UMass-Amherst Hillel House managed the project.

"This is going to rock. You have never seen anything like this before," said Ruthie.

The idea for this "Radical Conversation Series" was initiated by Oland because she is interested in the arts and culture, which is the reason behind why she was drawn to the Pioneer Valley area.

"I feel that every time I go to a cultural event in this area, I always bump into lots of Jews. Yet none of these events are intrinsically Jewish," Oland said.

"So, why not combine the two?" she said jokingly.

"There's a huge history and emphasis on social justice and progressive ideology in the Jewish tradition," she said.

Examples include Karl Marx and US Supreme Court Judge Ruth Bader Ginsberg, where the Torah commandment "Justice, justice, you shall pursue" hangs on her office wall. Many people involved who were involved in the Civil Rights movement were Jewish, including former presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman (D) who marched in the southern United States to ensure that people of all backgrounds would be allowed the right to vote.

"The reason I am including a conversation piece in each of these events is that I'd like to inspire and celebrate the connection between social justice, political progressiveness and action, with Judaism" said Oland.

When asked how much one person can do in terms of being socially progressive, Oland quotes a passage from the Talmud, a Rabbinic commentary on the Torah.

"It is not your job to complete the work [of saving the world], but neither are you free to abstain from it."

This Series is being co-sponsored by UMass Hillel House, UMass Radical Student Union, UMass Arts Council, Jewish Cultural Council and made possible in part by a Kolker-Saxon-Hallock Family Foundation Engagement Grant.

Police arrest one student in Coolidge

A University of Massachusetts student has been arrested in connection with reports filed by UMass Police Sunday that someone had entered a Coolidge Hall dorm room and struck another person with a belt.

UMPD Sergeant Joseph Mieczkowski said police have determined who the alleged suspect was and obtained an arrest warrant. The suspect was then found and arrested yesterday. Mieczkowski also said that a video camera is believed to be involved.

According to witnesses, police were reportedly keeping watch outside of Coolidge Hall yesterday afternoon before making an arrest around 6:00 p.m.

"There still might be other incidents in the dorm that we are now falling upon." Mieczkowski said.

The party, whom police declined to identify, has been charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon and breaking and entering in the night-time for a felony.

New bill to allow more gay marriages

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — As more states move to outlaw gay marriage, some Massachusetts lawmakers are hoping to make it easier for any same-sex couple to legally marry here.

They're pushing a bill that would lift a state law dating back to 1913 that bars Massachusetts from performing any kind of wedding for an out-of-state couple that would be banned in the couple's home state.

"We like it when couples who are straight come to Massachusetts. Why should we be afraid of gay and lesbian couples coming to Massachusetts?" Josh Frieder of the Freedom to Marry Coalition said.

The proposal is one of eight bills to be heard on Beacon Hill as lawmakers wade back into the gay marriage issue Tuesday, this time minus the throngs of impassioned protesters and phalanxes of satellite trucks that marked a debate last year on a proposed state constitutional amendment.

The 2003 decision by Massachusetts' top court to allow gay marriage has spurred a national backlash. Under the decision, gay couples began marrying in Massachusetts last May.

Kansas recently became the 18th state to pass a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage. Alabama, South Dakota and Tennessee plan elections next year on constitutional bans.

The court decision has also spurred opponents of gay marriage inside Massachusetts.

State Rep. Emile J. Goguen, D-Fitchburg, is sponsoring several of the anti-gay marriage bills, including a new proposed constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage without providing a civil union option.

Bolton endures UN confirmation hearing

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — John R. Bolton, a blunt diplomat whose nomination as U.S. ambassador to the U.N. is opposed by most Democrats and some in the foreign policy establishment, pledged Monday to help strengthen an institution that has occasionally "gone off track."

The Bush administration is committed to the success of the U.N., Bolton, the undersecretary of state, said on the first day of his confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He told lawmakers that "we view the U.N. as an important component of our diplomacy."

President Bush's selection of Bolton last month has stirred controversy because of his expressions of disdain for the United Nations and the blunt criticism he has leveled at North Korea and other countries and arms control treaties.

The committee's top Democrat, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, expressed his "grave concern" about Bolton's nomination, citing doubts about his "diplomatic temperament," his statements about the U.N. and international laws and treaties, and his leadership on weapons threats in places like North Korea and Iran.

"In my judgment," Biden said, "your judgment about how to deal with the emerging threats have not been particularly useful."

Sen. George Allen, R-Va., however, called Bolton "the absolute perfect person for the job."

Bolton, 56, has served in the past three Republican administrations and been one of his party's strongest conservative voices on foreign affairs issues. He is now the administration's arms control chief.

Bolton was asked about the impact on American standing overseas of the flawed U.S. intelligence on weapons of mass destruction in Iraq — displayed with much fanfare at the U.N. by former Secretary of State Colin Powell. "Unquestionably the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq has led some people to question our goodwill and credibility," Bolton responded.

He noted that the U.N. has both strengths and weaknesses and said that if confirmed he would try to help forge a stronger relationship between the United States and the United Nations, "which depends critically on American leadership." He said he aimed not just to promote American interests at the world body.

Bolton also took a critical tack, saying the U.N. General Assembly needs to focus more on human rights violators and international terrorism.

"We must work to galvanize the General Assembly to focus its attention on issues of true importance," he said.

"Sadly, there have been times when the General Assembly has gone off track," he added, citing the "abominable" resolution that equated Zionism with racism. It

Some upset over Law's Pope Mass

By Rachel Zoll
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Cardinal Bernard Law, whose failures to stop sexually abusive priests sparked the worst crisis in American church history, led a Mass for thousands mourning Pope John Paul II at St. Peter's Basilica on Monday after police whisked away a victim protesting outside.

Law celebrated the Mass without disruption, saying in his homily that Italian, Polish and other pilgrims were inspiring in their huge tribute to John Paul. Nearly 3 million mourners flooded Rome for the pontiff's funeral last week.

"In these incredible days, the pope continues to teach us what it means ... to be a follower of Christ," Law said, reading slowly in Italian. "Our faith has been reinforced."

After the service, several worshippers from Europe said they had never heard of Law. American parishioners said they recognized him, but questioned whether the protest was appropriate right after the pope died.

"It's not the time or the place," said Mary Beth Bauer, who lives in

For the record

In yesterday's edition of the Daily Collegian, an incorrect caption was placed underneath a photo of Cardinal Bernard Law on page four. The caption read that Law was accused of child molestation, which is incorrect.

Although Law was at the center of the Boston Catholic sex abuse scandal two years ago, he was never accused of sexual abuse.

The caption also read that he is the subject of protests surrounding church closings throughout the state, which is incorrect. The current leader of the Boston Catholic Archdiocese is Archbishop Sean O'Malley.

The Collegian sincerely apologizes for these errors and any confusion they might have caused.

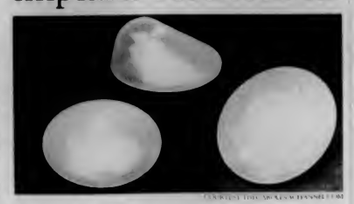
Government reopens debate on breast implant restrictions



By Lauren Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Thirteen years after most use of silicone-gel breast implants was banned, the government reopened emotional debate Monday on whether to lift the restrictions — despite lingering questions about how often the devices can break inside women's bodies and how bad those breaks really are.

In an extraordinary daylong hearing, dozens of women, many in tears, told federal health advisers of pain and crippling health problems when silicone leaked from broken implants into their breasts and beyond. Others, angry at their difficulty in getting what they called the most natural-feeling implant to rebuild cancer-ravaged breasts or to enlarge small ones, urged the Food and Drug Administration to lift its near-ban.

"My plan to be more beautiful was ironic," said Rebecca Smith-Miles of Michigan, describing how rocklike scar-tissue formed around her gel implants within two years. "I was uglier by the day."

"They poisoned my mother."

Silicone breast implants are currently the subject of government debate. Many feel the silicone implants cause health problems.

said a tearful Brenna Dowd of Boise, Idaho, speaking after her mother, Pamela, told of surgeons having to scrape silicone off her chest wall from broken implants. Pamela Dowd said she still suffers disabling pain, but that, like many implant recipients, she has been denied health insurance.

On the other side, women happy with the gel implants charged that U.S. hurdles to get an option widely available overseas are unfair — and that silicone is used in other medical devices without concern.

"We all deserve to feel beautiful, and if not beautiful at least normal," said Anna Daly of Nashville, Tenn., who received silicone-gel implants in a research study after breast cancer surgery last year. She said today's main option, salt water-filled implants, sloshed in her chest and often wrinkled.

"We have a right to decide what is right for our own bodies," agreed Virginia Silverman of Orange County, Calif., who received gel implants in 2001 and called saline implants too uncomfortable.

Some Catholics upset with Law

Maine and had followed the abuse crisis and Law's resignation.

But some Catholics said seeing the cardinal presiding over Mass at one of the most significant sites for their faith was another sign that the Vatican did not understand the betrayal parishioners felt that he protected guilty priests.

Barbara Blaine, founder of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, and Barbara Dorris, also a leader of the advocacy group, said the Vatican's choice of Law devastated victims.

"We believe he should take a back seat and stay in the background so Catholics can grieve without having to have the sex abuse scandal in their face," said Blaine, who had flown into Rome just hours before the Mass.

At St. Peter's Square, Blaine planned to distribute fliers, but was quickly surrounded by Italian officers who moved her without incident outside the plaza. The officers did not respond when asked why she was removed, but Blaine said they told her that news cameras were not allowed.

Blaine said she felt compelled to travel to the Vatican from her home in Chicago after learning of Law's public role in memorializing the pope. The Mass is one of nine daily services for the pope for the period of mourning called Novemdiales.

Law resigned as archbishop of Boston in December 2002 after unsealed court records revealed he had moved predatory clergy among parishes for years without telling parents their children were at risk. He has apologized for his wrongdoing.

More than 550 people have filed abuse claims in Boston in recent years, and the archdiocese has paid more than $85 million in settlements. The scandal erupted in Boston in January 2002 and spread nationwide, causing what American Catholic bishops have called the worst crisis in the U.S. church.

After Law's resignation, the pope appointed him archpriest of St. Mary Major Basilica in Rome, one of four basilicas under direct Vatican jurisdiction.

Some church leaders have said the Vatican chose Law to celebrate the Mass because he leads an important church, not as a personal honor.

FBI manhunt launched for S.C. murder, rape suspect

By Pamela Hamilton
Associated Press

MYRTLE BEACH, S.C. — Authorities have launched a nationwide manhunt for a smooth-talking ex-convict who is suspected of killing two people and who once vowed he would never return to prison in a book he co-wrote with two professors.

Stephen Stanko, 37, is suspected of strangling a female librarian he lived with and shooting a man to death before stealing his pickup truck. A teenage girl also says Stanko raped her.

"He is very dangerous," Horry County police Lt. Andy Christenson said Monday. "Anybody who's capable of doing what he did ... is considered armed and dangerous."

Stanko was released from prison nearly a year ago after serving 8 1/2 years of a 10-year sentence for kidnapping.

Stanko was known as someone who didn't mind talking about his life in prison, so those who knew him were surprised to learn of the new allegations.

"He seemed to feel comfortable letting people know that he was an ex-con," said John Gaumer, who was in a library book group with Stanko. "It didn't seem to bother him."

Stanko co-wrote "Living in Prison: A History of the Correctional System With an Insider's View" while in prison with the help of two criminology professors.

One of the professors, Gordon A. Crews, told Florence television station WBTW he knew Stanko was having a hard time adjusting to life on the outside.

Stephen Stanko is the subject of an F.B.I. manhunt.

"Nobody wants a convicted kidnapper working at Best Buy with them," Crews, a criminal justice professor at Roger Williams University in Rhode Island, "The last time I spoke to him, he was very, very depressed. He was on the verge of giving up," Crews said.

Several calls to Crews and the other professor, William Gillespie, were not returned to The Associated Press.

A week ago, Stanko was fired after working for a month as a salesman for Stucco Supply in Myrtle Beach. Jeff Kendall, the company's general manager, described Stanko as a smooth talker who was upfront about his time in prison, but was unreliable and brought in few sales.

"He wanted to do everything," Kendall said. "I was the one that gave him a chance. I said, 'I'll give you a chance, but from there, it's up to you.'"

Police said one of the victims was 43-year-old librarian Laura Ling, who shared a home with Stanko and was found strangled Friday. The other victim, 74-year-old Henry Lee Turner, was found shot to death in his home Saturday. Stanko and Turner knew each other, but it was not clear what their relationship was, Christenson said.

"We believe that Stanko has targeted senior citizens in the past in an effort to scam them out of money," Christenson said.

US contractor is kidnapped in Iraq

By Tract Carl
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A U.S. contractor was kidnapped Monday in the Baghdad area, the latest in a string of abductions that have forced many foreigners to work here under armed guard. A pickup truck also exploded near a U.S. convoy as it patrolled a crowded market in the troubled city of Samarra, killing at least three people and injuring more than 20 others.

Three suicide bombers also hit a Marine outpost in western Iraq, wounding three Marines and three civilians in an attack claimed by Iraq's most feared terror groups.

A U.S. Embassy spokesman said the American contractor, who was working on a reconstruction project, had been abducted around noon. He refused to release an identity or other details, but said the contractor's family had been informed.

In Samarra, a troubled city 60 miles north of Baghdad, a pickup truck blew up near a U.S. patrol, killing three civilians and wounding more than 20 others, including four U.S. soldiers, officials said. One soldier was evacuated for medical treatment, and the others were treated and returned to duty, the U.S. military said.

Loudspeakers urged residents to donate blood as the wounded poured into the hospital. Most of the injured were women and children, hospital official Abdul Nasir Hamid said. The incident was in the Sunni Triangle, a stronghold of the insurgency.

Early Monday, suicide bombers tried to crash two cars and a fire truck into Camp Gannon in the western desert, but "the drivers of the vehicles were stopped short of the camp by forces manning the checkpoints," a U.S. military statement said.

The vehicles exploded, wounding three Marines and three civilians and causing slight damage to the concrete barriers and a nearby mosque, U.S. officials said.

Insurgents also fired at the camp, which is in the town of Qaim near the Syrian border, and a U.S. attack helicopter destroyed a car carrying a gunman, officials said. It was unclear how many insurgents and suicide bombers were killed in the assault.

was repealed in 1991, with Bolton playing a leading role as a State Department official.

Sen. Richard Lugar, the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, talked at length about the controversy over Bolton, saying opponents have criticized him as "abrasive, confrontational and insensitive."

"In the diplomatic world, neither bluntness nor rhetorical sensitivity is a virtue in itself," the Indiana Republican said. "There are times when blunt talk serves a policy purpose; other times it does not."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he had serious questions about Bolton's "commitment to the U.N."

"It is critical we have someone with respect for diplomacy, who believes in the United Nations despite its flaws," he said.

"I'm surprised the nominee wants the job he's been nominated for, given the many negative things he's had to say about the U.N.," Biden said.

Three protesters briefly interrupted the proceedings, standing up in succession with pink T-shirts and banners, one reading: "Diplomat for hire. No bully please."

Critics of Bolton cite his comment from that 1994 speech that it would not matter if the top 10 stories of the 39-floor U.N. headquarters building in New York were lost.

"There's not a bureaucracy in the world that couldn't be made leaner," responded Bolton.

Committee Democrats also have circulated a portion of a 2-year-old Senate Intelligence Committee report questioning whether Bolton pressured a State Department intelligence analyst who tried to tone down language in a Bolton speech about Cuba's biological weapons capabilities.

According to committee aides, among critics being contacted by committee Democrats is Christian P. Westermann, a department intelligence officer who has clashed with Bolton.

On extremism in Israel

Yousef Munayyer

We often hear about Palestinian extremists. There is a constant barrage of rhetoric in the media about how a "Palestinian partner" must first control the extremists on their side before they can be talked to. Rarely, however, do we hear about the extremists on the other side, the Israeli extremists. Recently they have been quite noticeable due to the tensions evolving around the disengagement. We must now put this in the context mentioned above. In other words, can the Palestinians deal with an Israeli partner if that partner cannot control his extremists?

In the Israeli political spectrum, which is wide and varied, there are members to the right, which are dealing, or have already dealt, a deadly blow to the peace process. These members are the Israeli colonists and their supporters. A colonist has chosen to live on illegally occupied land and their presence is maintained by military force. Their colonies, which take up portions of the West Bank and Gaza including vital water supplies, are well protected and are connected to each other and Israel by roads that are exclusive to Jews.

Yet these colonists are not only causing suffering for Palestinians, they are beginning to cause major headaches for everyone else in the Israeli political system. The Gaza disengagement plan, which is a unilateral initiative by Ariel Sharon and is also problematic, has caused the extremist Israeli colonists to protest the actions of the government.

In Gaza, roughly 8,000 colonists live under military protection among 1.5 million Palestinians, the vast majority of which are refugees. These colonies not only occupy disproportionate amounts of land, but they also take up extremely disproportionate amounts of water for a very dry and most densely populated spot in the world. Over the removal of 8,000 colonists, who are living on illegally occupied land, the Israeli extremists and their supporters are voicing vehement resistance.

These colonists are unmistakably religious fundamentalists who chose to live on this illegally occupied land because of the religious connection they believe they have with the land. The fundamentalist nature of these extremists is a large part of the problem. It is not that there is no room for them in the United States and Western Europe where many of them come from, or in Tel Aviv for that matter. On the contrary, they are insistent on living on illegally occupied land and they have become a burden on everyone else.

Though there is mandatory conscription in Israel, in most cases, the colonists do not serve in the army. They are excused because there life is devoted to the scriptures. Yet this is problematic to many Israeli soldiers who feel that they are defending these religious fundamentalists unjustly.

This Sunday, in an ongoing response to the disengagement plan which has grown more and more tense, colonists were planning on demonstrating en masse at the revered noble sanctuary. The site in Jerusalem, sacred to both Jews and Muslims, has been the target of Israeli extremist violence before, and Sharon's visit amidst hundreds of armed guards in 2000 sparked the second Intifada, or uprising. It was only in the face of thousands of riot police that the expected demonstrations diminished.

It is not that there is no room for [the colonists] in the United States and Western Europe where many of them come from, or in Tel Aviv for that matter. On the contrary, they are insistent on living on illegally occupied land and they have become a burden on everyone else.

The violent reactions have come as a response to the disengagement plan that involves 8,000 people. The fundamentalists are so angered by this plan that they are calling Israeli police who control demonstrations "Ges-tapo." In recent weeks, Sharon also announced that the largest colony in the illegally occupied West Bank, Ma'ale Adumim, would be expanded by 3,500 homes and this has drawn criticism from the international community and members of the U.S. government who see it as detrimental to the peace process. Imagine what would happen if all illegal colonies were evacuated and the land returned to the rightful owners?

The answer to that question is too hard for Sharon to bear and for this reason he has had to be comforted by the United States, which has declared it will support Israel's retention of major population centers in a final status agreement.

Israeli extremists pose a serious threat to their own government, to the Palestinians and most importantly, to a just peace. We can all surely say that this is one big mess and trying to untangle it would mean political suicide for Sharon, but has anyone paused to think about the roots of this problem?

Israeli colonies did not exist in the West Bank before it was illegally occupied in 1967 and every colony which has been built there since has been built contrary to international law. In fact, colonial activity increased even after Israel entered into a peace process based on a two-state solution. Now, with his political life on the line, Sharon has to decide between following the law and supporting extremist colonists in the West Bank.

Unfortunately, with Israel and Sharon in the past, international law has always come in second place and things aren't looking to good this time either.

Thongs with no consideration

Stacy Kasdin

I was sitting in the Blue Wall the other day enjoying my lunch when my eyes began to wander. People-watching makes for a good source of secondary entertainment to sandwiches. My eyes fell on a girl chatting with a friend with her back turned towards me. Half her butt was hanging out of her jeans, covered only slightly by her light blue thong. Now, I can tell when my shirt is up slightly higher than normal and half an inch of my back that doesn't normally show is showing, so I can't imagine how it would be possible for her not to realize that half her butt was no longer in her pants. Though, I also can't imagine why, if she did realize it, she would just continue this indecent display, particularly in an eating establishment.

The thong: my arch nemesis. Now I'm not saying I don't understand why people wear thongs. I realize there are a few very legitimate reasons to wear them. Some people feel that certain pants and skirts look less unattractive when one has a panty-line, and if someone is comfortable wearing a thong to prevent this, by all means go ahead.

Also, if you are in a relationship with someone and wearing thongs is something you choose to do for them, fine, what you do in the privacy of your own rooms and homes is your business. If you happen to be an underwear model and are getting paid to model thongs, well you're probably making a lot more money than I am, so congratulations. If for some reason you just find them unbelievably comfortable, well, I suppose that's your prerogative. I don't quite understand how an elastic string up your butt can be comfortable, but hey, if you think it is, go for it.

The simple fact that thongs exist is not what makes them my arch nemesis. What really bugs me about thongs is that although I don't personally own any, I see them everywhere, and I'm not talking about hanging on racks in stores. I can't remember a day when I didn't see a single thong hanging out of someone's pants or skirt, and believe me I'm not looking for them, they're just always there.

There's a reason underwear is worn under the clothes. It's supposed to be an intimate article of clothing that you don't show off to anyone and everyone who happens to be sitting behind you in class. Between the thongs coming out the top of people's skirts and their butts about ready to come out the bottom, there's just no mystery to anyone's body anymore. There was a point in time when you only saw so much of someone's body when you were married to them, or at least dating them, but now it's just a free-for-all.

There's a reason underwear is worn under the clothes. It's supposed to be an intimate article of clothing that you shouldn't show off to anyone and everyone who happens to be sitting behind you in class.

Granted, I haven't dated any girls lately, and guys don't seem to have that same sort of revealing style, but I feel that if I were dating a girl, I probably wouldn't want her showing herself to every guy on campus. I also think that maybe seeing so much of someone before you know a single thing about them makes getting to know them a little less appealing, because you've already seen all there is to see.

Now, I know many people aren't putting quite so much analytical thought into their clothing. I know it's warm out, and I know these clothes are what the stores are selling. I know that it feels good to know you look good, and to know that people are looking at you because of it, but if you are attractive, you're still going to be just as attractive no matter how much skin you're showing.

A little modesty goes a long way. I'm not saying to wear skirts to your ankles all the time, or overalls and turtlenecks year-round, but have some consideration for those who would rather enjoy their sandwich sans butt. More importantly, have some consideration for yourself. What should really make you feel good is the knowledge that people find you fun to hang out with and interesting to talk to. Looking good is fine, but it would be a shame if that were the only reason anyone ever paid any attention to you. Here's a thought, next time keep your thong in your pants and show off your conversational skills instead. It might make you feel better than any double-take look or whistle ever has.

The cost of the Iraqi conflict

Todd Hanaburgh

Recently the U.S. military's official death toll in Iraq reached 1,500 soldiers. To see their names and photos (when available) go to: http://www.cnn.com/SPECIALS/2003/iraq/forces/casualties/. There has been a U.S. Department of Defense ban on media coverage of the U.S. troops' bodies returning from conflict since the previous Bush Administration's Gulf War. This helps to keep the public's mind off of the negative side of war, or the "3 Ds": death, destruction and dismemberment. Admittedly, it is easier to advert public scrutiny of the legality of a war if we are reminded less of its cost and casualties.

The monetary cost of the Iraq conflict, despite original projections by the administration, has surpassed $200 billion and with Bush's newest request of an additional $80 billion, is rapidly approaching $300 billion. Bush's Fiscal Year 2006 Budget for the Department of Defense is a record high of $419.3 billion (a 41 percent increase since 2001), and doesn't include the per annum cost of operations in Iraq (demonstrated to be between $100 billion to $150 billion).

Aside from being a colossal waste of taxpayers' money, the U.S. invasion and subsequent occupation of Iraq is also illegal by international and domestic standards.

Instead, Bush will petition Congress for additional emergency funding on an as-needed basis. Aside from being a colossal waste of taxpayers' money, the U.S. invasion and subsequent occupation of Iraq is also illegal by international and domestic standards.

Although the president has the power to send troops to places in which there is an imminent threat to national security (War Powers Resolution of 1973), he does not have the power to declare war. That is an exclusive power of Congress (Article 1, Section 8, Clause 11 of the U.S. Constitution). While Congress did, in fact, approve of the use of force by providing funding for operations, it has not declared war since World War II.

So all of the talk about being a nation at war and supporting the war effort is bunk. There must be no special concession made to the federal government as a result of the so-called state of war. There is no war in Iraq, there is a U.S. occupying force in Iraq. At nearest definition, it could be called the Iraq conflict. However, this distinction did not deter the U.S. government from sending over 8.7 million young Americans to Vietnam during the Vietnam conflict (another U.S. military operation erroneously referred to as a war). 58,000 of which died.

With no end in sight, the violence rages on in Iraq. We currently have about 110,000 soldiers stationed there. The total U.S. wounded in action is over 11,500. The news media purports that U.S. deaths have decreased (55 in January 2005, 41 in February 2005, 31 in March 2005), claiming a winding down of the insurgence.

However, the same kind of trends can be seen throughout the span of the conflict. Seventy-three were killed in November 2003, 25 in December 2003, 35 killed in January 2004, 12 killed in February 2004. There's hope, right? No, 33 were killed in March 2004, followed by 127 soldiers in April 2004. There is no winding-down. Some analysts contend that the average life span of an insurgency in the region is roughly 10 years. We are in the dawn of this insurgence.

But enough about U.S. troops, what about the other guys? The Iraqi people, remember them? The U.S. Department of Defense has not provided a report for the public on this issue. Neither have any of the other coalition members taken it upon themselves to make an accurate count, but modest estimates of the civilian casualties in Iraq number between 17,000 and 20,000 people.

One of the best online sources for the civilian death toll in Iraq is www.iraqbodycount.net, which compiles news reports and official reports from several sources, including Iraqi morgues, to tally their figures. The Web site also quotes General Tommy Franks of U.S. Central Command as saying, "... We don't do body counts ..." The reports of Iraqi civilians wounded are even more sketchy, ranging between the moderate 100,000 to a wild, yet plausible, half million plus.

Could this be correct? Is this justice and freedom at work? According to a recent Reuters News article by Luke Baker, insurgents, terrorists and Iraqi criminals have killed about 6,000 Iraqi civilians since 2003. This means that U.S. and Coalition Troops have killed at least two to three times as many Iraqis, in the same two-year period. Is it surprising that we are known as the bad guys in their neighborhood?

This war was supposed to be about Weapons of Mass Destruction, but there were none. It was supposed to be about liberating the Iraqi people, but they are prisoners of violence. It was supposed to be about stopping the spread of terror, but our president said, "Bring 'em on." It makes me ashamed to be American.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STOP HYPOCRISY IN MIDDLE EAST

After reading the most recent article by Ramzi Kanazi, I would just like to point something out to the readers and students at UMass that they might not know. Mr. Kanazi comments that Israel destroys Palestinian homes for no reason and that their tactics would "make a suicide bomber blush." What he doesn't tell us is that the homes Israel destroys belong to those same recently deceased suicide bombers after they take out a city bus or a restaurant.

Palestinians are warned time and time again that if they stage attacks against innocent civilians in Israel, they will be punished, and if they decide to blow themselves up and leave pieces etched in the minds and fears of Israeli citizens, then the least they can expect is for the house they used to live in will be plowed over. Imagine if all America did after Sept. 11 was to go to Afghanistan and Iraq and only knock over the homes that the terrorists lived in — the world would be outraged. So little punishment for so big a crime.

However, when Israel seeks to punish those responsible for killing innocent people, they are the focus of international condemnation and hatred. It's time for the world to recognize that Israel has a right to defend itself and should not be looked down on for doing so. The same goes for Caterpillar, a company that is out there to make a profit.

Nobody has said anything about the United States and companies in the '30s and '40s investing in Nazi Germany to make some money. It's their right to invest and sell to whomever wants to buy. Israel buys these bulldozers legally, and Caterpillar sells them legally. It's time for the world to stop the hypocrisy and either condemn everyone equally or let the world's corporations conduct their business in the best way they see fit.

GEO PROTEST DISRUPTS LEARNING

I will preface this by saying that I have had a number of outstanding, Graduate student TA's for many of the large lecture courses I have taken here at UMass over the past three years. Their dedication to helping students learn has always been exemplary, and I have never had any of the bad experiences with TA's that I have had with some UMass professors. However, on Friday, as I sat in Herter Hall in a discussion section, taught by a graduate student, I began to lose respect for the organization, as they try to lobby for a new contract with the administration.

I just don't understand how an organization that prides itself on dedicated service to undergraduate students thinks it is a good idea to protest while classes are going on. It's one thing to rally outside, march around campus, chant, bang on drums, whatever. However, to enter academic buildings and disrupt classes is utterly ridiculous. In my opinion, it is the equivalent of holding a clean water rally while polluting an ocean or river.

If I were the head of the GEO, I would be ashamed, and if I were a member of the GEO, I would want whoever planned that rally fired. You may realize that us undergraduates have zero influence whether or not you get pay increases; it's the people over in Whitmore that have the say. Turn your wrath over there, and don't disrupt my education.

Angels grace the Fine Arts Center

By Jared Demick
Collegian Staff

If you haven't seen the UMass Theater Department's production of Angels in America: The Millennium Approaches yet, then I strongly advise you get out of your dorm room (which we all spend way too much time in anyway) and see it this weekend.

If you don't, you will be missing a performance of extraordinary power, one that touches upon both the deepest and most immediate problem that we all face: the need to be loved. While cleverness comes in abundance in theater, plays that deal with humanity with such compassionate honesty are rare.

Tony Kushner's Pulitzer-prize winning drama explores the America of 1985, the era of the Reagan dynasty and also the beginning of the AIDS epidemic. Skillfully weaving politics and personal relationships together, Angels is amosaic of characters culled from all walks of life from gay drag queens to Valium-addicted wives to powerful governmental players. What draws their stories together is the fact that they are all confronted with the dreadful prospect of irreversible changes in their lives.

The characters Prior and Louis are a gay couple falling apart because Prior has been diagnosed with AIDS. They both love each other terribly, but Louis cannot stand to watch someone he loves die so he walks out on Prior. Prior finds himself facing his terrible illness alone and the thought of this terrifies him.

Another character, Roy, also must battle AIDS alone. In Roy's case, his loneliness is self-imposed as he ruthlessly used people to gain power in the government. Roy also savagely tries to hide the fact that he is homosexual. This fear of embracing one's sexual orientation also afflicts Roy's protégé, Joe. Joe is a Mormon who has been taught that he should suppress his homosexuality and this belief traps him in a sexless marriage with Harper, his Valium-addicted wife. Harper, tortured by the lack of affection that she receives from Joe, retreats into elaborate fantasies that dangerously blur her sense of reality. The play, through its relentless exploration of the full range of emotions residing in all these complex characters, reveals that despite our differences, we are all undeniably human and linked by that very blessing and/or curse.

The play itself juxtaposes side-splitting humor and devastating tragedy in order to bring about the healing, bittersweet catharsis that Greek playwrights dreamed about. The cast is wonderful in this production and they so skillfully portrayed their characters that, at times, one felt that they were no longer acting. Evan Fuller (Roy) was particularly impressive as he captured the helpless rage that his character possessed with a passionate intensity. Thomas Patrick Naughton (Prior) and Courtney Roy (Harper) brought a sense of vulnerability to their performances that demanded sympathy from the audience. Ed Ahern gave a wonderfully restrained turn as Joe that highlighted even the subtlest changes his character underwent. Michael Marceline (Louis) was thoroughly annoying which is what made his performance great as his character was a self-torturing neurotic. Wesley Montgomery pulled double duty as a hip talking figment of Harper's imagination and a drag wearing friend of Prior's.

There were also wonderful minor performances by others, which helped to make the production collectively strong. The stage itself was bare as props and scenery were constantly rotating and the changing scenery added to the play's sense of transience. Probably the greatest feat that the cast and crew managed to pull off was making performance seem complete. This is no easy task considering that The Millennium Approaches is only the first part of Angels in America.

One character, Louis, proclaims in a long diatribe that, "There are no angels in America". However, after spending three hours absorbed by a compassionate portrayal of our collective struggle to come to terms with change, one is inclined to think that maybe the angels reside in us all.

Angels will be performed at the Rand Theater in the Fine Arts Center on Thursday and Friday at 8 pm and on Saturday at 2 pm.

Daring, comedic, poetic, and brutally honest, Angels in America: The Millennium Approaches truly is a singular experience that no one should miss.

Eating Disorders: Schiavo case holds many lessons

By Howard Cohen
Knight Ridder

MIAMI — Lost amid the controversy over Terri Schiavo's feeding tube and the recriminations surrounding her recent death is the heightened awareness of eating disorders.

Medical records suggest Schiavo's condition was caused by bulimia and a severe potassium imbalance in her blood, which led to cardiac arrest and brain damage.

"The most important message, and which hasn't gotten the press, is that all of this came about because of her apparent eating disorder," said Joanna Popper, a Miami Beach documentarian who was bulimic for eight years until she sought help from a therapist.

"I didn't want to live like that anymore," said Popper, 32, who along with Arne Zimmermann, coproduced the new video, "The ABC's of Eating Disorders: The Documentary."

"So many eating disorders start as a little diet and ... turn into deadly habits. Here was a beautiful woman who went down this path, not able to deal with the emotions going on in her life. So many people out there are also caught up in this emotional battle and don't know how to deal with what is going on in their life. They don't see that it's going to be such a big deal."

It's treated, she said, like "an accelerated diet."

Nearly 10 million women and one million men are affected by anorexia nervosa or bulimia nervosa, and an additional 25 million suffer from a binge eating disorder, according to the Seattle-based National Eating Disorders Association.

Moreover, eating disorders are hitting younger girls, including the preteen set, and more men. An April 2001 report in the Journal of the American Psychiatric Association said one male suffered from anorexia for every four females; for bulimia, it's one male for every eight to 11 females.

But eating disorders are seldom covered by medical insurance, a reality Popper and the association feel should be a wake-up call in the wake of Schiavo.

Popper says shame often keeps victims from seeking help.

"If there were less shame, better insurance, involved for people with eating disorders, many people would come out faster and get help. Denial is a big part just like with alcoholism. But part of that denial may come from the fear of having other people know what you are doing and what their perception of you might become," said Popper, who became bulimic at 21.

She didn't tell anyone she was bulimic at the time, not even while seeing a therapist.

"I know I was always concerned with looking good and appearing strong and invincible when I had an eating disorder.

"But if eating disorders were treated as something that happens to 'normal' people and not only shown in the very extreme cases and celebrities, it might be easier for people to stop and accept that they have a problem, stop denying, and get the help they need."

Making Memories

Two women meet after 22 years

By Michael Granberry
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Jennifer Blakley had been waiting for this moment for 22 years. "I have butterflies, yes I do!" she said. "I do. This is my first time to be nervous. I haven't been nervous. I haven't been. You'd be surprised how calm I've been about it."

Jennifer was talking fast. Her husband was bemused. Because Matt Blakley knows that 22 years of expectations don't exactly mesh with "calm."

At any moment, Jennifer, 33, would come face to face with fate. Her pen pal of more than two decades — a Danish woman she had never met or spoken to on the phone — would land at Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

Hanne Magnussen, 36, would walk through the revolving door of Gate 30 at the Terminal B baggage claim area and take their friendship to a new level. She and Jennifer had thought about this moment since 1983, when Ronald Reagan was president and the Cold War was still, well, cold.

Hanne would bring with her a husband and two children and 22 years of shared memory. "I don't know what to say," Jennifer said to her husband.

"Well," Matt said, "why don't you just say ... 'Howdy'?"

Trying anything at that point to calm down his wife, to make her laugh, he reminded her of what their 7-year-old son had been saying all week: "When are our Danishes coming?"

A FRIENDSHIP BLOSSOMS

When Jennifer was 13, growing up in Pearland, Texas, a friend — who ceased to be a part of her life long ago — told her about a pen pal company. So, she dashed off a letter, asking for a female correspondent. "and six weeks later, I got a postcard in the mail with Hanne's address," she said. "So, I wrote her."

Soon, the letters were flying back and forth, at least once a month, a pace the two have maintained for two decades plus. At one point, they exchanged audiotapes, and once, Jennifer sent Hanne a videocassette. (She had to rent special equipment just to watch it.) So each had heard the other's voice, despite never having shared a live conversation.

In the beginning, they shared only the normal girl stuff — favorite foods, favorite colors, favorite music (Duran Duran). Most of all, they exchanged thoughts and feelings and concluded that they were eerily similar, despite being separated by continents and cultures.

"We really grew up with each other," Jennifer said. "We could tell each other secrets! After all, who would she tell in Denmark?"

As the girls became young women, dating became topic No. 1. Around the same time, both fell in love — with quiet men, valued as much for being calm as compassionate. Their lives took a parallel path yet again when the women got pregnant.

"Our daughters are the same age — 11," Jennifer said. "And her other daughter is almost the same age as my second son. So we talked pregnancy a lot."

Jennifer graduated from Texas A&M University and became the loyal wife of an active-duty officer of the U.S. Marine Corps. For nine years, they were hunkered down in such outposts as Twentynine Palms, Calif.

Hanne grew up in Hjoerring, Denmark, and now works for a computer company there. She and her family live 15 miles away, in the small seaport town of Hirtshals.

Waiting at the airport, as the baggage-claim moment drew near, Jennifer marveled at the fact that she and Hanne have managed to feel even closer, despite the demands of adulthood. Today, the Blakleys have three children — Allison, 11, Kyle, 7, and Zachary, 5, to the Magnussens' two — daughters Lisa, 11, and Emilie, 6.

At any moment, "the Danishes" would plant their feet on Texas soil.

ANTICIPATION BUILDS

A few hours before leaving for America, Hanne sat at home in Hirtshals, nervous as a cat. But, make no mistake, it was a "good" nervous.

"It's amazing!" she said by telephone. "I've known her longer than I've known my husband. We go so way back. I can't even remember our first letters. I remember she sent me gum, and it was so different from our gum. We wrote a lot about movies and food. After we had children, we got closer, I think. We talked about more family stuff. Feelings.

"We could talk about marriage and when we felt happy, when we felt ... upset. We could argue with our husbands and talk about that. We talked about everything — religion and terrorism. When the World Trade Center was hit, I wrote her right away."

E-mail, of course, has elevated the correspondence to a new dimension, though e-mail, both women say, is a mixed blessing. When cyberspace came into vogue, the letter-writing stopped. Because of e-mail, Hanne was able to notify Jennifer within hours that her 11-year-old daughter had been hit by a car while riding her bike. And Jennifer could bare her soul on a daily basis in 2003, when her husband was called up by his Reserve unit and deployed for most of the year in California.

"I'm nervous she will be disappointed — with me," Hanne said. "And I'm nervous about a lot of other things. Will we get along? Will our kids get along? I know her so well, and yet we've never met. We've never even talked on the phone!"

Despite being tempted, Hanne refused to call Jennifer on her last birthday. She even refused to call the day before departure, to provide updated flight details.

"I don't care if it's a big airport," she said. "We'll just have to walk around until we find each other. We can't speak until we actually see each other! I want nothing to spoil this."

WORTH THE WAIT

Showtime!

For Jennifer, "the moment" had arrived. Peering beyond the revolving door, she saw a 22-year relationship walking right at her. "There they are!" she screamed. "Oh, my gosh! Oh, my gosh! She sees me, too!"

And then came the waves, cascading gales of girlish laughter, followed by an endless hug. It was a warm embrace between women who have shared so much — adolescent angst, courtships ending in marriage, the rigors of childbearing, the sorrow of wars and terrorism.

"Oh, my gosh!" Jennifer said. "How are you? Oh, my God, oh, my God! How are you? I don't believe it. I don't believe it."

"This is surreal!" Hanne said, her arms still clinging to Jennifer.

"Hey, that's my word!" Jennifer said. "I can't believe you're here. Just look at me. I'm shaking."

Hanne's husband, Jon Magnussen, said his wife had grown eerily quiet as the moment drew near.

"Expectations," he said with a smile.

Soon, the Magnussens and Blakleys would be heading north, into the Texas night, gearing up for a fortnight in which nine people would share the same house. It would be two weeks of baseball and barbecue, Easter egg hunts and even a bit of Duran Duran.

"I was worried, but not any more," Hanne said with a smile as big as Texas. "She's absolutely wonderful. She and her family are everything I dreamed they would be." To the naysayers: Ha!

OK, so that was Saturday night, March 19. How was it going nearly two weeks later?

Never better, Jennifer said. Night after night, she marveled at the fact that her pen pal of 22 years was sitting across from her at the evening table. She also feels vindicated, for more than one friend had waxed skeptical about the prospects of the meeting she and Hanne had prayed for since 1983.

"I think we knew what to expect more than anybody else," Jennifer said. "Everybody else kept telling us we didn't know what to expect. But we were right."

"We were right," said Hanne, who has discovered in person that she and her pen pal have more in common than she ever thought they would. "We're alike. We think alike about a lot of stuff. And we're kind of the bossy types. We like to control people. We like to organize stuff!"

As the women looked at each other and laughed, Jennifer shook her head. She still can't believe all the naysayers, the ones who kept saying she ran the risk of feeling disappointed after meeting her pen pal in person.

They were wrong, she said — meeting a lifelong friend in person is 100 times better than getting a letter or an e-mail.

"Now it's her turn to visit me," Hanne said. "So do it now, Jennifer. Book your flight to Copenhagen. We can't afford to wait 22 more years."

Woods shows he is beatable

One of them was a 3-wood that he crushed down the middle. The other was a towering 8-iron that covered the flag and dropped 15 feet behind it. The birdie putt was good all the way, and Woods began his celebration when the ball was still a foot from the cup.

Woods is beatable, but his record is now 9-0 with a 54-hole lead in the majors.

"I went out and shot 68 around here on Sunday, which is a very good round," DiMarco said. "And 12 under is usually good enough to win. I just was playing against Tiger Woods."

Woods now has won the Masters with three swings — a powerful swing he brought to the PGA Tour in 1996, a refined swing crafted with Butch Harmon that took Woods to a sweep of the majors, and a new swing philosophy taught by Hank Haney that remains a work in progress.

Woods has been criticized by some and scrutinized by most for changing a swing that brought him nine victories in 2000 and left him miles ahead of any challengers. Woods spoke more of validation than vindication Sunday evening.

"Hank and I have put some serious hours into this," Woods said. "I read some of the articles over the past year of him getting ripped, I'm getting ripped for all the changes I'm making. And to play as beautifully as I did this entire week is pretty cool."

Woods will not play for three weeks, returning to the Wachovia Championship the first week in May. The next major test comes June 16-19 in the U.S. Open at Pinehurst No. 2, where Woods tied for third in 1999. A month later comes the British Open at St. Andrews, where he completed the career Grand Slam in 2000 with an eight-shot victory.

The PGA Championship in August is at Baltusrol, and the PGA of America on Monday promoted its major by noting that Woods has never played in New Jersey, and tickets are going fast.

Kelley seeks HR record

SOFTBALL from page 8

Kelley is now in a three-way tie atop the school's all-time home run list with Scooter Wheeler and Brandi Cross. Sortino believes it will only be a matter of time until Kelley has the top spot to herself.

"I'm not surprised," Sortino said of Kelley tying the record in only her junior year. "I think she'll shatter it. Those kinds of records are part of our history and tradition, and especially since we've had such a long line of previous success, it's great for our players to see new young players breaking those records. It's good for the program."

Kelley was not the only player for the Maroon and White to have a big day against GW, as Puglia went 5-for-7 in the two games to raise her batting average to .353. The senior shortstop is second to only Proctor (.365) in batting.

Sortino expected the team to have a potent offense and feels its greatest asset is its depth.

"I think offensively our kids have been doing a good job at the plate," Sortino said. "I think they're getting more comfortable and confident, therefore, they're becoming more productive. We're scoring more runs easily. Our running game is coming together. Our lineup isn't dependent on one or two people. Different people come through at different times. We're strong [the positions] 1-9, and on our bench."

UMass has match postponed

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Senior Day for the Massachusetts women's tennis team (14-6, 4-0 Atlantic 10) has been postponed until next Monday.

The Minutewomen were slated to take on Holy Cross yesterday at the Upper Boyden Courts. The match will mark the final home match for UMass senior captain Sasha Edelstein.

So far this season Edelstein is 12-8 primarily out of the No. 3 slot in the UMass lineup. She is also 9-7 in doubles competition when paired with junior Iana Bartoloni.

Currently the Minutewomen are on a seven-match winning streak that includes wins over A-10 rivals Temple, Richmond and Fordham. This past weekend the Maroon and White was able to pick up two key victories.

On Friday they defeated Quinnipiac, 6-1, in Hampden, Conn. UMass was able to defeat in-state foe Boston University for the first time in 10 tries on Saturday.

The postponement of the match should benefit the Minutewomen as the A-10 tournament begins April 22 in College Park, Maryland. Having their final home match one week later gives the team less time in between competition.

It was also announced yesterday that UMass sophomore Michele Spiess and freshman Masha Pozar have earned A-10 weekly honors.

Spiess received the A-10 Performer of the Week Award for the third time this season. She also won the award on February 21 and March 28. In the past week Spiess went 5-1 in her matches against Fordham, Quinnipiac and BU.

Overall this season Spiess has the best record on the team. In singles competition she is 17-3 normally in the No. 1 slot. The duo of Spiess and Pozar is 12-8 in the No. 2 slot.

Pozar was awarded the A-10 Rookie of the Week Award also for the third time this season. She was Rookie of the Week on March 14 and March 28. Pozar also went 5-1 for the Minutewomen last week.

Pozar is showing a lot of potential this season playing mainly in the No. 2 position for the Minutewomen. So far this year the rookie is 13-8 in singles competition.

Red Sox recieve World Series rings

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON — Two of them have moved on to other teams. One has retired.

But Derek Lowe, Dave Roberts and Ellis Burks were all back in Boston on Monday to accept the World Series rings they earned as members of the Red Sox last season and all received among the loudest ovations from the Fenway Park crowd.

"This is a once in a lifetime thing," said Roberts, who is now with San Diego, but received permission from the Padres organization to attend the event.

"Winning the World Series after 86 years was very special and...I didn't want to miss out on this."

Lowe said he was still puzzled by the Red Sox lack of interest in re-signing him but was happy to be back, if only for a day.

"I was standing next to Jason (Varitek) and I said 'You're lucky, you get to play here for the next four years,'" said Lowe, the right-hander who signed with the Los Angeles Dodgers during the off-season, and also had permission from his new club to attend. "Because there's really nothing like it...I'm very fortunate to be in another rivalry on the west coast, but nothing matches this."

Lowe said the Red Sox never contacted him about coming back, not even to say they were not interested. "That was the thing I was most disappointed at," he said.

"They run a really good business here and they obviously made the decision to go with (Matt) Clement and (David) Wells over Pedro (Martinez) and myself," he said.

Lowe had a less-than-scintillating 14-12 record and a 5.42 ERA during the regular season, but was the winning pitcher in the clinching games of all three of Boston's post-season series. He received one of the loudest ovations of the pregame ceremony when he walked from the home team dugout.

"The fans have always been great to me," he said.

And he knows the fans will remember the good over the bad.

"If you ask people in five years what was my record in 2004, no one's going to remember, people are going to remember the playoffs," Lowe said.

Fans will always remember Roberts' contribution to the Red Sox first championship in 86 years, even though he played less than half the season with the club.

The speedy outfielder hit .256 with the Red Sox after a trading deadline deal that brought him from the Dodgers, but he will be remembered for the stolen base in Game 4 of the American League Championship Series against the New York Yankees that started Boston's unprecedented comeback from a 3-0 deficit in the best-of-seven series.

Minutewomen face UConn

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team (15-11-1 4-2 Atlantic 10) will look to extend its season-long four-game winning streak today when it travels to Connecticut to face the UConn Huskies at 4 p.m.

The two rivals are meeting for the first time this year, but they have met 82 times previously and UConn (11-18) holds a slight edge in the all-time series, 41-39-2. UMass coach Elaine Sortino expects her team to be challenged by a UConn team that has been up-and-down this year.

"UConn looks like they're having a roller coaster kind of year and I think we are too in a lot of ways," Sortino said. "We're getting a little bit more consistent everyday, but we still have a ways to go. It's a tremendous rivalry."

UMass has been struggling to find consistency all year, but it appears that the team may finally be hitting its stride. The Minutewomen have outscored their opponents 21-2 in their last four games.

While the offense has begun to come around lately, it's been the pitching that has carried UMass during this stretch.

The duo of Barb LaFogg (10-7, 2.32 ERA) and Jenna Busa (5-4, 2.70 ERA) has been almost unhittable against, as they haven't allowed an earned run in the four games.

In LaFogg's last two starts, the senior right-hander has allowed only three hits and one unearned run, while recording 24 strikeouts to run her A-10 leading total to 117.

Busa has been equally as impressive allowing a total of four hits and one unearned run in her last two starts. Busa's dominant outings came after her worst start of the season at Fordham, where she allowed 14 runs as part of a double-header sweep by the Rams.

"Barb gets better every game," Sortino said. "She gets a little more sure of what she can do and how to go about it. I think the Fordham disaster was a wake-up call for Jenna. She made some changes and adjustments that have had a dramatic affect on her pitching the last two games."

The offense has been led all year by Hilary Puglia, KJ Kelley and Lauren Proctor.

Kelley, who has been battling an ankle injury, had a big day on Saturday in UMass' doubleheader sweep of George Washington. The junior catcher ended a 15-game homerless streak with a drive over the scoreboard in left field in the third inning of the first game.

The homer was Kelley's team-leading fifth of the season and the 26th of her career.

Senior pitcher Barb LaFogg throws a pitch against George Washington last weekend. LaFogg has 10 wins for UMass this year.

UMass tries to stop bleeding

By Todd Foster

Since 1900, the Massachusetts baseball team and the Connecticut baseball team have been part of a close rivalry. Though both teams are at different ends of the spectrum this year, the Minutemen (3-17, 0-6 Atlantic 10) will host the Huskies (20-9, 4-4 Big East) today at Earl Lorden Field with the first pitch scheduled at 3 p.m.

UConn own a 72-69-3 advantage over UMass in the 105 year-old series. This is the second time these teams have met this season, with UConn defeating the Maroon and White 9-0, on March 22 in Bridgeport — the alternate location due to poor field conditions in Storrs. The Minutemen scattered five hits in the game, while the Huskies struck out 13 batters and walked none.

"There has always been a good rivalry between us and UConn," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "The former coach here, Dick Bergquist, and Andy Blaylock, the former coach at UConn, had a great relationship. Then Andy and I always had a great relationship, but now they got a new coach there. There has always been that UMass-UConn thing and it's a fun rivalry, but there is no bad blood at all. I'm looking forward to it."

The new Huskie coach is Jim Penders, who had spent 11 of the last 13 years as a student athlete and an assistant coach with the program before being named head coach in 2003. Penders was a standout for the UConn Huskies as a four-year letterman. He was the co-captain of the 1994 Huskie squad that advanced to the NCAA championship. That year, he held a batting average of .354 with seven homeruns and 46 runs batted in as a senior.

Penders has put together a squad without many holes. The team batting is at a mark of .294 with six different players hitting over .300. Rightfielder Tony Mallozzi is at the top of the list with .382 BA.

On the hill, there is depth in both the bullpen and the starting rotation. Posting a team earned run average of 3.27, the team acc has been Rich Sirois, who has a record of 5-2 with a 2.06 ERA with nine complete games and 32 strikeouts.

The bullpen has put up the most impressive numbers with two players giving up only three earned runs in 33.1 innings. Ted Garry sports a 0.79 ERA with a record of 1-1 and three saves. The second part of the deadly duo is David Erickson, who has two saves and 29 strikeouts in 22.1 innings pitched.

"I thought they were a good ball club," Stone said. "They hit the ball well. They're scrappy. They play good defense and have good pitching. They look like a solid team and their record shows that at 20-9. They are one of the better teams in New England."

UMass is on a 12-game skid after losing three games this weekend to Duquesne. The Maroon and White are being out-hit by .106, as it is batting .198 as team while opponents are hitting .302. However, senior Jason Twomley will look to continue his 11-game hitting streak.

"We have to learn to leave the disappointments behind and start moving forward," Stone said. "That's a key thing, as well as in the ball game. If kids continue to bring their disappointments out of the field, we can't be effective. That's part of the game. People strikeout and make outs, it's going to happen. Baseball is streaky and hopefully we are at the end of a streak."

On the hill, the Minutemen are struggling to find depth in the rotation and bullpen. With the team ERA at 5.84, junior Matt Torra has been the only consistent performer with a 1.50 ERA. Though, freshman hurler Aaron Smith will get his action as a UMass pitcher tomorrow versus a dangerous Huskie line-up.

"He's one of the guys we really wanted to have on our ball club," Stone said. "We think he's going to be a good pitcher. He's got to get his feet wet and get him a start. We got to get more younger players into the ballgame that will help us in the future."

Senior outfielder Jason Twomley leads the Minutemen in batting average, hitting .396 this season.

Francona back on the bench for Sox

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Terry Francona wasn't feeling very well when he woke up Monday morning. At least he wasn't worried.

Doctors already had "checked everything they could think to check" after he suffered tightness in his chest last Wednesday, he said. "I got my OK the other day."

So on Monday, the manager of the Boston Red Sox ran out of the dugout toward the first base line where he was the first member of the World Series winners to receive his championship ring during a ceremony before the home opener against the New York Yankees.

"I'm just glad I'm available to be here to get introduced," Francona said before the game. "What I really care about today is I want us to win. That's what I needed to get back to.

"We're 2-4 and I'm miserable."

He managed the first two games of the season against the Yankees then was taken to a New York hospital before last Wednesday's final game of the series. He also missed a three-game series in Toronto that ended Sunday.

On the team bus to Wednesday's game, "I had some tightness in my chest. I think I had classic signs of heart problems," Francona said. "It runs in my family so much that it sent up a lot of red flags. I think it scared me a little bit, too."

He still had his sense of humor Monday when he joked about the way closer Keith Foulke gave up two runs in the ninth inning before retiring the side in Boston's 6-5 win on Friday.

"If I didn't have a heart attack then, I'm never going to," Francona said.

He did come into his Fenway Park office briefly Sunday.

Terry Francona, the head coach of the Boston Red Sox was back on the bench for Opening Day.

"I'm not sure I had to, but it was a good excuse to get out," Francona said. "It's just because I've been in bed for five days. I just need to get my strength back."

Team physician Dr. Thomas Gill has said that tests showed no evidence of a serious heart problem and that Francona's chest pains probably were caused by "a recent viral illness." And Francona said he wasn't feeling well the last two weeks of spring training.

"I was really struggling but I wouldn't give myself a day off and I probably should have," he said. "I think I probably ended up paying the price."

Red Sox beat Yanks at Fenway

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Nine decades in the waiting and five months in the planning, the Boston Red Sox celebrated their 2004 World Series title on Monday with gaudy rings, a jumbo pennant and the best sign of all for a repeat in '05: a victory over the rival New York Yankees.

Red Sox	8
Yankees	1

Tim Wakefield pitched seven strong innings and Doug Mirabelli homered to give the Red Sox an 8-1 win over the Yankees, who played compliant guests by watching and clapping during the hour-long ring ceremony and then fumbling away the game.

Mike Mussina (0-1) allowed seven runs — four earned — on seven hits, three walks and five strikeouts in five innings. Alex Rodriguez, the focus of much Boston ire during the off-season and the fans' taunts during the game, misplayed a grounder for an error that let in three Red Sox runs as they made it 7-1 in the fifth inning.

Jason Giambi received mild boos in his first road game since his off-season was tarnished by the steroids scandal.

With manager Terry Francona back in the dugout, the Red Sox took a 2-0 lead on Mirabelli's second-inning homer and made it 4-0 on Kevin Millar's two-run single in the third. After Rodriguez singled, stole second and scored on a throwing error by Boston shortstop Edgar Renteria, Rodriguez gave back three runs with an error in the bottom half.

Woods ranks among the best

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. — All the images paint a picture of Tiger Woods returning to the pinnacle of golf.

A shot that ranks among the most amazing ever at Augusta National. The intense face bursting with raw emotion when the winning putt dropped on the 18th hole. His fist punching the air with an uppercut, his roar drowned out by a delirious gallery. The red shirt beneath a green jacket.

Woods won the Masters for the fourth time and returned to No. 1 in the world Monday.

CBS Sports said the overnight television rating was 10.3, up 41 percent from last year and the highest for a final round at the Masters since Woods won in 2001 to become the first player to sweep all four majors.

The victory Sunday at Augusta National put him back on track to go after Jack Nicklaus' record of 18 majors. Woods now has nine majors, tied with Ben Hogan and Gary Player, and he is still only 29.

But there was something different about this victory.

Woods no longer looked invincible with a final-round lead in a major, spitting up three shots on the final nine holes. No one feared him, least of all Chris DiMarco, who outplayed Woods in every aspect of the game except when it mattered - with a putter in his hand.

Having gone nearly three years without a major while retooling his swing, it appears that this might be the start of a new era for Woods. If that's the case, it might be different in one area.

Nothing seems to come easily.

Woods won for the third time this year, and none of the finishes were particularly inspiring.

He had a one-shot lead in the Buick Invitational and went for the par-5 18th green in two over the water. But he missed a 2-iron so badly that it came up 20 yards short, and only stayed dry because it landed so far to the right.

Woods pulled ahead of Phil Mickelson in the Ford Championship at Doral with a dramatic birdie on the 17th hole. But with a chance to put him away on the 18th, Woods missed the green and had to scramble for par.

And he had a two-shot lead over DiMarco until making bogeys on the last two holes.

The old Tiger would not have given his opponents any hope.

The new Tiger keeps everyone guessing to the end.

Ultimately, all that mattered to Woods was slipping into his size 43 Long green jacket for the fourth time, joining Nicklaus (six) and Arnold Palmer (four) as the only players who have won the Masters at least four times.

And despite the shaky finish, the lasting image of Woods is that he always manages to get it done.

"At least I didn't lose it on the last hole," Woods said. "I got into a playoff, and then I hit two of the best golf shots I had hit all week."

Dillon to remain with Patriots

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON — Running back Corey Dillon could remain with the New England Patriots for the rest of his career under a contract extension signed Monday that could run for up to five years and earn him more than $25 million, his agent said.

The 30-year-old Dillon had been set to receive $3.85 million next season in the final year of his current contract, but the Patriots began negotiating a new agreement in February after he helped lead the team to its third Super Bowl win in four years, said the agent, Steve Feldman.

"They stepped up and took care of him, even though he's on the wrong side of 30," Feldman said. "This deal allows him to end his career as a Patriot."

The agreement guarantees Dillon $10 million over two years and could be extended for up to five years and a total $25 million in base pay and various bonuses, Feldman said.

Patriots spokesman Stacey James couldn't confirm the deal.

The 225-pound Dillon rushed more than 1,000 yards in the first six of his seven years with the Cincinnati Bengals before suffering a groin injury in 2003. He lobbied to be traded to a winning team and got his wish before last season when the Patriots swapped a second-round draft pick for Dillon to bolster their ground game.

He responded by rushing for 1,635 yards last season - a career-high and Patriots season record - and 12 touchdowns. In the Patriots' 24-21 Super Bowl win over the Philadelphia Eagles, Dillon gained 75 yards on 18 carries and scored on a 2-yard run. He also had three receptions for 31 yards.

After the victory, he said all he needed was the right situation to bring out the best in him.

"God put me in a good place and surrounded me with good people. This whole thing has been a true blessing. ... This is what it is all about," Dillon said.

Feldman said Dillon was "absolutely thrilled" with his contract extension.

The Bengals built their struggling franchise around Dillon in the 1990s, and he became one of only four players in NFL history to run for 1,000 yards in each of his first six seasons. The groin injury in 2003 - the first significant injury of his career - limited him to 11 starts and 541 yards that season.

The Bengals tired of his complaining about not getting the ball enough and his wishes to move to another team. But before the 2004 season, he signed a five-year, $26 million deal with Cincinnati.

To join the Patriots, Dillon agreed to restructure the last two years on his contract, softening the Patriots' salary cap hit for 2004.

Dillon, who turns 31 in October, played college ball with the University of Washington and was a second-round pick in 1997, the 43rd overall. He broke Jim Brown's rookie record by running for 246 yards against Tennessee.

Commission and Lombardi issue timeline

On Monday, University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi posted the second draft action plan on the Commission for Campus Diversity's Web site.

While the plan gave more details about various recommendations made by the commission on March 1, no major changes were included.

Lombardi posted his initial plan on March 12 and it immediately drew harsh criticism from various members of the University community, especially those involved in student government.

Lombardi's initial report was 17 pages and the second draft, "On Improving Campus Diversity," was 33 pages. The second draft also gave a direct response to all 15 of the commission's recommendations that it made after a four-month study. Lombardi also addressed the campus' response to his report.

"We recognize the complexity of the issues we address, the long history of achievement on which we draw for insight and inspiration, and the intense commitment expressed by so many voices reflected in the Commission report," Lombardi said in his report.

"We have no illusions that the measures outlined here will win universal approbation from every campus constituency," he added.

Besides his idea for a new center, the Center for Student Development, that would group together various groups on campus, Lombardi also was under fire for not accepting the commission's number one recommendation.

"Appoint a senior level administrator with adequate staffing,budget and resources to report directly to the Chancellor to review and coordinate all diversity and inclusion activities at the Amherst Campus," the commission initially recommended.

On Monday, Lombardi stood by his refusal to grant this recommendation, citing his response in his initial draft.

Then-SGA president Eduardo Bustamante was extremely upset at Lombardi's plans, and he made an alternative proposal that appears on the commission's Web site.

Five College area students set to kick off Relay for Life Friday

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Students consumed with last-minute fundraising efforts are preparing to "walk" to a cure for cancer this weekend during the third annual Relay for Life.

The event is a culmination of year-long fundraising efforts by students in the five-college area participating in a common cause.

The relay, which takes place at the Amherst College track will begin this Friday afternoon and linger into Saturday afternoon. Students from the University of Massachusetts and the Five-College area will lace up their sneakers and walk around the track for 18 straight hours — with all donations going to the American Cancer Society for patient services and cancer research.

Among the hundreds of students, the UMass radio station WMUA 91.1 FM will be there to provide music and there will be food that has been donated from local area restaurants as well as showcasing six local bands, a comedian, prizes, games and t-shirts.

Co-chairs and UMass students Missy Ivanoski and Nicole Lohr anticipate a great weekend.

"This is an opportunity for students in the five-college area to meet each other and gather for a common cause," Ivanoski said.

The participants have made up teams and team names, and raised money in efforts to campaign for cancer research. Last year, collectively, the teams raised over $45,000 for the American Cancer Society, and according to Lohr, "had a wonderful time participating in the event."

"It is important for people to get involved, whether it is walking, fundraising or volunteering," Lohr said. "Cancer is a disease that effects everyone, and it is important to realize the severity."

Ivanoski added that, "people come to the relay to honor those who have survived cancer to remember those we have lost the battle and survivorship is the reason why we relay."

Lohr also added that this event is a major fundraiser while participants have great time camping out in tents and socializing with friends. "It is always a really fun night," she said, "everyone stays up all night."

Student launches popular Web site

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

The idea for umasslinks.com came to Dan Reed as a means for convenience. He wanted a homepage that allowed him to search the Web and also made all the links a typical University of Massachusetts student may want available at his fingertips.

"I wanted Google as my homepage," Reed said. The 20-year-old sophomore felt that making a search engine his homepage left him without easy access to the parts of the Internet that he as a student also needed to use on a regular basis. From there it wasn't a very big leap to the site up and running today.

"Umasslinks.com emulates Google, but has more to offer," Reed said. "It still opens up with that search box right there but there are other links too." Among those links are SPIRE, OWL, the UMass Amherst version of Web CT, People Finder and even a local weather forecast. On a more national scale, visitors to the site can check the latest Red Sox scores and hit up their Hotmail inbox, all with a click on umasslinks.com.

Reed, a School of Management major who lives in the Southwest residential area, found the site took on a new shape as he began sharing it with friends and other members of the student body.

"It is a collage of ideas all developed by students," said Reed. "I just brought it together." It became apparent as he started developing umasslinks.com that the demand for something like it was not just present but was high. "I found a lot of people willing to contribute."

Although Reed found the site developing into a useful resource he knew it was missing something. "When I got the idea to add the numbers for restaurants, that was when the site really started to click."

The advent of restaurant links on the site led Reed to include links to the actual menus right on the site. "People like the look of the menu. They don't like when they can't locate an item on the on-line menu," said Reed.

"We have actual scans of the real menus on umasslinks.com so you're not missing out on anything."

Reed felt that the online ordering craze that has recently developed isn't flourishing because it is too much of a change from what students are used to. "Paperless menus are an alternative that can catch on," he said. The menu is available online but students still have the choice to order by phone. The use of the same menus we are all used to seeing shoved under our dorm room doors makes it more simplistic for users. "We are giving you a very visual, easy to use site," said Reed.

Launched earlier in the semester, umasslinks.com's reputation has already begun to spread via word-of-mouth. "We get about 4000 hits a day," said Reed. "[Monday] was our highest recorded hit day, with 4503 people visiting the site."

The Web site originally did not have the domain name umasslinks.com. "It used to be one of those free sites [like Geocities] but I felt like for the site to really catch on I needed a '.com' [address]," Reed said. "It has really increased the popularity."

It was in February that the site found itself a permanent home on the Web. "We started umasslinks.com in the beginning of February, adding the newest hit counter on Feb. 14," Reed said.

"Basically it is just me," said Reed of the creative team behind the Web site.

With a little help from a cousin who is a Web designer, Reed has made umasslinks.com a multifunctional stop for the busy student.

"I would say its an all-in-one package as a homepage," said Reed. "You have Google, all the UMass sites and more all at one place."

The future of umasslinks.com looks bright. Reed recently launched a version of the site for Bentley College. "It gives students in business hands-on experience," said Reed. "They get to work for a real business and sell our service."

He has his eye on other schools as well. "We are opening up at Kent State next week." Sites for Bridgewater State College, University of Connecticut and University of Rhode Island are also in development.

On its home turf, umasslink.com will look to expand in the coming year. A make over is on the way in the next few weeks. "We are looking into redesigning the site right now, making it more packaged," he said.

Reed has even planned for a table in the Campus Center at the start of the fall semester to raise awareness about the site and give away promotional items.

Receiving over 50 emails in just over two months and welcoming over 90,000 visitors since February, it is clear that umasslinks.com is well-received by the UMass student body.

"The great thing about our site is that it creates a community," said Reed of umasslinks.com. "The students are shaping the site."

Hatch lays out new budget fund plan

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Trends in the University of Massachusetts' general budget fund and the impact of the Capital Plan was discussed in great detail by Joyce Hatch, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance, on Thursday at the 640 Regular Meeting of the Faculty Senate.

Hatch began her presentation by delivering "good news" concerning the University's current budget situation.

"This year we are very stable. That still may not make a lot of people happy since we still have many things that are under funded, but the freefall of budget cuts over the last three years has stopped," she said.

In 2004 alone, Hatch said the budget cuts amounted to over $36 million. The strategy that was used to address this deficit was to increase student fees as well as receive bargaining increases.

One question that Hatch said she is frequently asked regards where all the money that has been raised through higher student fees is going and why it isn't enough to cover the budget cuts.

"Student fees definitely helped to offset the budget cut. So why wasn't that enough to solve the problem?" Hatch asked.

Although student fees have gone up by 40 percent during the last two years, she said that cost increases such as salaries to any non-unit members of the faculty as well as the utility budget also increase every year.

Reaction group holds first meeting

By Meaghan Geisler

Over the past two years in Darfur, Sudan, more than 180,000 people have been killed and more than two million have been displaced from their homes and villages. The Genocide Reaction Committee will have its first meeting this Wednesday addressing these issues.

The Genocide Reaction Committee has been formed by Chris Turk, a sophomore political science major at the University of Massachusetts. With the Genocide Reaction Committee, he said hopes to raise concern on campus about the situation in Sudan.

For the past two years there has been a war going on between the Janjaweed, a militia group, and two rebel groups, the Sudan Libertarian Army and the Justice and Equality Movement. The Janjaweed have been attacking villages, where the kill men and rape and kill the women. This current conflict has left a million children malnourished.

There has been international pressure on the Sudanese government to disarm the Janjaweed, but the Sudanese government has shown little evidence of doing so. Although disarmament has been the main concern of the international community, other issues such as, malaria, AIDS and food and water shortage are other problems as well. The UN has predicted that over the next 18 months four million people will

Financial aid and curriculum fees must also be considered, according to Hatch.

"Since student fees went up by 40 percent, the cost of financial aid must also go up to cover the difference," she said. "And the increase of fee waivers for all the graduate students does go up also."

Hatch also noted that payment for some debt that was borrowed years ago for infrastructure was now kicking in, accumulating to $9.9 million.

"The point is that with the loss of state funds and cost increases of 38 million, we balanced the budget with student fees and the campus budget," Hatch said, summing up the past two years.

Looking ahead, Hatch addressed the issue of student fees by saying that she is committed to keeping increases down to three percent for the next few years.

Also discussed was the future of utility costs at the university. She said that $42 million has been invested in order to conserve energy on campus.

"We will be converting from coal primarily to gas, but oil as a backup," Hatch said. "The good news is that it will be more efficient and cleaner — the bad news is that by dropping coal, which is the cheapest form of energy, the cost increase would normally be about 3 million ... but we are able to offset that with some of the energy savings and other things we are doing."

Hatch continued her presentation by discussing the current budget for the Capital Plan.

"This year we are putting in an additional 5.4 million into the Capital Plan out of our operating budget," she said. "Next year it will go up by about 3 million, the next year 4 [million] and so on. This is in addition to the 30 million that is already in our operating budget, which will go towards remodeling and other major projects."

Hatch said that the Capital Plan's budget amounts to about $544 million over a five-year period. She added that a state contribution of only 11 percent is expected.

"The majority of the money (about 87 percent) will be funded through UMass Building Authority borrowing, campus borrowing for the energy project, or the campus revolving pool," Hatch announced.

According to her, new building construction costs will amount to about $200 million, since only 34 percent of the buildings on campus are reported to by in "good" condition.

"After spending only half a million dollars, that statistic goes up to 40 percent," Hatch said. "But we have a long way to go before we can really fix the campus."

made up of lawyers, accountants, as well as others concerned with women's reproductive rights. Bruce told of a time when many abortion clinics in California were being blocked by groups of males against the act. These men gave out maps to clinics, and Bruce's group gave out some of their own; which took people elsewhere.

"I want feminism and unlocking every door within it," added Bruce. "I want every choice to be available so you can have a choice."

Later, Bruce enrolled in NOW, working for such issues as childcare, economics, and healthcare.

According to her website, www.tammybruce.com, after becoming the NOW's president, she brought people together and campaigned against domestic violence, violence against women, and the image of women in the media.

"NOW showed me the height of the abortion wars," explained Bruce. "I joined because activism can improve lives for everyone. Blacks, homosexuals, and women need it."

Putting an emphasis on individuality, Bruce noted her accomplishments in NOW and All Fired Up; but also pointed out what she did not like about them.

"You join a group because you feel different and identify with people in it," said Bruce. "However, you become absorbed into it and are erased within the framework of the group. The irony is you have to conform. There were times when serving in NOW when I was told to go along with something I did not think was right. Other times, I just sat back or had to lie about my feelings."

Bruce said looking back, she is proud of many of her accomplishments.

"As I've rethought all of my positions, I own them. I don't need the approval now to be accepted. I finally find it okay that I don't have to be someone for somebody else," Bruce commented.

Bruce used the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks as an example where people as individuals worked together in overcoming hardship.

"Stripping yourself from a group can be related to the plane that went down in Pennsylvania during 9/11," stated Bruce. "In those moments for all of the people on the flight, whether they were gas, black, or of other color; they were human beings who knew what they were doing in that moment. All of those factors melted away, they worked together against the terrorists."

She also explained how other politicians try to label her Bruce, who is pro-choice, a gun owner, for the death penalty and is openly gay is a Democrat who has voted for such presidents as Ronald Reagan, Bill Clinton, and President Bush.

"I refuse to leave the Democratic Party," added Bruce. "I get emails from people calling me a poser. I am what I say I am and so are you. You are what you say, regardless of what the group you belong to says."

be affected by the food shortage in Darfur.

At the Genocide Reaction Committee meeting, Turk said he wants to address some of his plans. One of his main goals is to start fundraising here on campus and eventually in surrounding communities.

"I want to raise concern on the issue by building a voice out of UMass that will hopefully grow into a compelling force," Turk said. "The point of starting the committee is first and foremost to raise money to immediately support those who are suffering in Sudan through fundraising activities."

Turk also hopes to be able to work with other groups that are concerned with the situation in Sudan because he said that this isn't something that he wants to keep local to UMass. He hopes to be able to reach out to the communities surrounding UMass and get them involved as well.

Another organization that Turk is hoping to get involved with the Amnesty International Office located in Somerville.

The Amnesty International Office is a non-profit organization that addresses human rights issues.

Turk's hope is that if enough people voice their concern across the country then hopefully the United States government will react to the Sudan crisis.

He believes that if the U.S. started a peace keeping mission in Sudan many other countries will join in the movement.

The Genocide Reaction Committee will have its first meeting on today at 8 p.m. in Kennedy dormitory on the nineteenth floor in the lounge.

Rumsfeld urges government to avoid politicizing military

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

SALAHUDDIN, Iraq — On a whirlwind tour of Iraq that included his first visit to the Kurdish region, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld urged the emerging national government on Tuesday to avoid politicizing the Iraqi military.

At a news conference in a shaded courtyard surrounded by young pear trees, Rumsfeld was asked whether Iraqi officials he met earlier in Baghdad had given him assurances about continuity in the senior leadership of the Iraqi security forces.

"It's not so much a matter of continuity as a matter of competence, of capability," he said in an appearance with Massoud Barzani, who has joined political forces with his former Kurdish rival, Jalal Talabani. "It's a matter of not causing undue turbulence in the Iraqi security forces and not setting back the important progress that's been achieved."

Last week, Talabani was selected as president of the transitional government now being formed and will lead the country until constitutional elections scheduled for December. Some in the Bush administration fear the new interim government will force out political rivals who have been working with U.S. officials since Iraq regained sovereignty last June.

Defense Secretary Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld said Washington hopes to see in the new government "highly competent people who are not going to politicize security forces" but will keep to the current strategy of maintaining a U.S. presence until Iraq's own forces are capable of defeating the insurgents.

President Bush, meanwhile, visited with soldiers at Fort Hood, Texas, and said the war in Iraq is "entering a new phase" as Iraqi security forces and government institutions become more capable and self-reliant.

"America and its coalition partners are increasingly playing more of a supporting role," Bush said. "Like free people everywhere, Iraqis want to be defended and led by their own countrymen. We will help them achieve that objective so Iraqis can secure their own nation. And then our troops will come home with the honor they have earned."

The president met privately with the families of 33 soldiers who were killed.

Bush likened the April 9, 2003, toppling of Saddam Hussein's statue in Baghdad to the fall of the Berlin Wall, calling it "one of the great moments in the history of liberty."

As is his practice on trips to Iraq, Rumsfeld held what he calls a "town hall-style" meeting with a few hundred soldiers of the 3rd Infantry Division, the main U.S. force in Baghdad. He pinned Bronze Star medals and Purple Heart awards on several soldiers and participated in the re-enlistment of about 100 soldiers.

The best-remembered Rumsfeld encounter with troops was his question-and-answer session last December with National Guard soldiers in Kuwait, many of whom were preparing to head to Iraq. One soldier complained to Rumsfeld about inadequate armor for his unit's vehicles, and Rumsfeld's response was seen by many as dismissive of the armor problem.

Three men indicted on charges of plotting various terrorist attacks in the United States

By Mark Sherman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Three men have been indicted on charges they plotted to attack financial institutions in New York, New Jersey and Washington.

A four-count indictment unsealed Tuesday accuses Dhiran Barot, Nadeem Tarmohammed and Qaisar Shaffi of scouting the New York Stock Exchange and Citicorp Building in New York, the Prudential Building in Newark, N.J., and the International Monetary Fund and World Bank in the District of Columbia.

The three men, already in custody in England, were charged with three conspiracy counts and providing material support to terrorists.

"They are indicted here and whether or not they actually ever are extradicted here I guess is a matter of discussion," said New York Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly.

"But I think it's important, both substantively and symbolically important, that you come here, you do this type of surveillance, we're not going to forget."

U.S. officials claim that Barot is a senior al-Qaida figure, known variously as Abu Eisa al-Hindi, Abu Musa al-Hindi and Issa al-Britani, who scouted prominent financial targets in the United States at the behest of al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

Prosecutors say the men conducted surveillance on the buildings between August 2000 and April 2001, including video surveillance in Manhattan around April 2001.

U.S. officials have previously described detailed surveillance photos and documents, which they believe came from Barot, which were found on a computer that was seized in Pakistan last summer.

That information prompted the government, in August, to raise the risk of a terrorist attack to "high" for those specific financial institutions. The color-coded threat level for the rest of the nation remained at yellow, or elevated, the middle of a five-point scale.

Federal authorities, who acknowledged the threat was based mainly on years-old intelligence, said the decision to raise the threat level was based on an abundance of caution and because of the lengthy planning and plotting record of the terrorist network known as al-Qaida.

Authorities uncover plot that would target the East Coast

The decision was made during a summer of unease over the possibility that terrorists might launch attacks on the political conventions or otherwise try to disrupt the presidential election. In March, bombs on trains in Madrid killed 191people days before Spanish elections.

Critics ascribed the elevated threat level to political calculations by the Bush administration.

The threat level was lowered to yellow for the buildings in November.

The men were among eight people arrested in England on terrorism-related charges in August.

Barot, 32, was charged there with possessing reconnaissance plans for the U.S. institutions and notebooks containing information on explosives, poisons, chemicals and related matters "of a kind likely to be useful to a person committing or preparing an act of terrorism."

Tarmohammed, 26, was charged there, along with Barot, with possessing plans of the Prudential building. Shaffi, 25, also was charged in Britain with possessing an extract from the "Terrorist's Handbook" on the preparation of chemicals, explosive recipes and other information.

The U.S. intends to seek their extradition once the British prosecutions are completed, Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

Their trial in England is expected to begin in January, according to the Crown Prosecution Service.

British proceedings and any sentences would have to be completed before extradition could be possible, the Crown Prosecution Service said. The service also said that until then, none of them would be available for interrogation by U.S. agents.

German man captured after holding school girls hostage

By Matt Moore
Associated Press

ENNEPETAL, Germany — German police commandos slipped into a house where a knife-wielding man was holding four schoolgirls hostage Tuesday, surprising the suspect and taking him into custody while rescuing his captives after a five-hour standoff.

The man inflicted a superficial knife wound on the stomach of a 16-year-old hostage, whom he held with three 11-year-olds, before he was captured by a police SWAT team that entered the red brick house at the end of a cul-de-sac shortly after 6 p.m., lead investigator Ulrich Kuhne said.

Police earlier said the suspect, identified as a 50-year-old Iranian asylum-seeker who has been in Germany since the 1990s, was injured as he was overpowered, but Kuhne gave no further details.

The man apparently wanted to be allowed to bring his children from Iran to Germany.

The SWAT team acted with particular caution, because the man was known to have psychological problems and the house in which he held the girls was owned by a hunter who had rifles and handguns on the premises, Kuhne said.

"Thank God, he did not use that opportunity," Kuhne said.

Police jumped the man after he had bound his four captives together to take them to the bathroom, Kuhne said.

The man had pulled the girls off a public bus he commandeered and forced them into the basement of the home at about 1 p.m.

The bus was packed with children on their way home from school in the town of Ennepetal, between the cities of Duesseldorf and Dortmund.

The mother of one child said the man told them he wanted to bring his family to Germany from Iran, a motive backed up by a letter in Arabic that police found on the bus, said investigating prosecutor Wolfgang Rahmer.

Renate Schulte said her 16-year-old son, Marvin, who fled after the man forced the bus driver to stop, told her the man read a statement saying his children were in Iran and he wanted to be allowed to bring them to Germany.

The man then herded some of the children to the back of the bus and tied several of them together by their belt buckles with a cord. He told the children to stay calm and said he wanted to talk to the German government, Marvin Schulte said.

"He didn't seem aggressive," the teenager said. "He said we should stay quiet and he didn't want to harm us."

The man forced the bus driver to stop and hustled the group of captives off the bus, but apparently let several of them go."

Students wrap-up fund raising in preparation for relay event

According to the rules of the relay, there must be at least one participant from each team walking throughout the night — which leaves time for people to rest, eat or sleep.

The festivities will kickoff Friday at 6:30 p.m. with the opening ceremony, which is often very emotional for students.

"Students share their personal stories and how their lives have been affected by relatives with cancer or their own personal stories," Lohr said.

After the ceremony, there is a survivor lap, where participants and cancer survivors initiate the relay with the first lap.

At 9 p.m. the luminary ceremony will begin where hundreds of candles will be lit in honor or in memory of a cancer patient.

Personal notes and anecdotes are written on the paper bags that add a personal importance and massage about the disease. Last fall, relay volunteers held a miniature event called "Light the Night" event on the Campus Center pond and lit hundreds of luminary.

"It was great to see so many people involved," Lohr said, "so many people filled out the [messages] at the Campus Center."

UMass students still have time to fill out a luminary today in the Campus Center.

Volunteers will be at a table in the Campus Center Concourse.

The American Cancer Society's Relay for Life event is still in its early stages on college campuses, however, but according to the press release, has raised millions of dollars nationwide.

Relay For Life began in Tacoma, Wash., in 1985 after one dedicated cancer-fighting advocate walked around a track for an entire day, and raised $27,000.

After the instant success of the relay concept, many groups and organizations started their own relays and the event became the "American Cancer Society's signature fundraising event," according to Relay's press release.

The relay was introduced among college campuses just three years ago, but according to Lohr, the success is overwhelming.

According to the American Cancer Society, five schools participated in relay in 2001, the number quickly climbed to 63 schools the following year. Nationally, Relay for Life has raised over $246 million over 3,300 events last year. This year more than 125 college campuses will participate in relay.

"We hope that someday cancer will be eliminated through our efforts," Ivanoski and Lohr said, "We have seen the dedication and witnessed the time students have put forth into this great event and we are looking forward to kicking off this Friday."

If you would like to donate to Relay for Life in the Five College area, please visit the Web site at www.acsevents.org/relay/fivecolleges.

Church right to allow Cardinal Law into conclave

Cardinal Bernard Law is a name that, to many, puts shame on the Boston archdiocese and the Catholic Church. Yet, despite the stigma carried with him, Law continued to show his devotion to the religion and to Pope John Paul II when he led a Mass on Monday, mourning the pope's death at St. Peter's Basilica in Vatican City.

Contrary to his denial and ignorance of priest pedophilia accusations during his tenure as Archbishop in Boston, Law still remains as one of the 115 members of the Cardinal conclave to elect the next pope, in addition to maintaining his title as chief priest of the Basilica of St. Mary Major. It is through his continued service to the Catholic Church that Catholics around the world are reminded of what kind of man John Paul II actually was, and what kind of man is needed to fill his shoes.

After denying the allegations against Boston's pedophile priests, Pope John Paul II did not reprimand or chastise Law, but rather, appointed him to a high Vatican post. This alone showed the pope's great knack for forgiveness, and demonstrated a quality that is very rare among religious figures, especially when concerning such grave accusations.

However, many believe that the pope was too lenient. The fact that there are mixed reviews about John Paul II's actions shows the need for the new pope to be more firm and crack down harder on sex offenders within the Church.

Also, by Law being allowed into the conclave, it shows that the Catholic Church is openly facing the problem of priest sex offenders, as opposed to hiding it in the closet. The whole issue is one that the Church could do without and has brought great shame and controversy to Catholicism as a religion. By allowing Law, a centerpiece in the sex scandal, to be a part of the conclave, the Church is telling its followers that they are not ignoring the problem and are going to make sure it won't happen again. Law is serving as a symbol to everyone that the Catholic Church will no longer tolerate such behavior.

There were many similarities between Law and John Paul II with regards to their leadership skills and their religious mindsets. Both were trained in close-knit clerical societies that rewarded those who stood by the Church and denounced those who strayed from it. Law did just that, he stood by the Church when it was under fire ... by denying the accusations. His method, to solve the problem, was one that dug the Church deeper into the hole that they're trying to get out of now. While the pope was an example of loyalty that was to be looked at and praiseworthy and admirable, Law's loyalty was just the opposite.

Giving Law a chance, and standing by John Paul II's decisions to allow him to still be a part of the Catholic Church, is something that is needed in order for the Church to move forward into modern times. There are many other issues that the Church will have to face, and if they can get over this hurdle and elect a pope that will not allow this to happen again, the Catholic Church can easily move forward with the rest of the world.

Giving back to the Earth

As Earth Day approaches swiftly (it is next Friday), we should all try to take a moment to be thankful for the many things that the bountiful Earth supplies us with, things that we sometimes take for granted, and forget to appreciate fully.

Joseph St. John

Without the Earth, there would be no clouds in the sky, there would be no rivers or trees, there would be no mountains or lakes. Without the Earth, we could not get to and from class. There would be no ground to walk on. We could not quench our thirst at the water fountain after a long afternoon of playing Frisbee under the hot sun on the field near our dorms if there was no water to drink, or fields to play on, or dorms to live in.

We could not be with the people we love and look up to the moon if there were no Earth for the moon to play with. There would be no birthdays or holidays for anyone without the Earth. There would be no food, plants, or animals.

With Earth as our only resource, the giver of the ground that we walk on, our fountain of life and our supplier of precious air that fills our lungs, she deserves to be taken care of. She is a friend, and friends should be appreciated and loved dearly. When the Earth is kind and gives us a nice glass of lemonade after allowing us to drive in nice cars and eat the glorious foods she gives us, we should be saying, Thank you Earth. I owe you one, and make a mental note to do a favor for the Earth sometime. What better time to do a favor for Earth than Earth Day?

Each of us is really small compared to the Earth, so each of us cannot repay the Earth for all of the majesty it gives, for every breath it supplies us of clean oxygen, and every pretty view from a mountaintop. But a person can show thanks and respect to the Earth in many ways that a big friend like the Earth can appreciate. Friends like to be loved, treated fairly, honestly, and not forgotten and used. The Earth likes to have songs written about it, and to be the hero in great stories, but most of all it loves to share its bounty with all of the creatures and plants that accompany it on its great journey through space, because it would get lonely without its many close friends.

With Earth as our only resource, the giver of the ground that we walk on, our fountain of life and our supplier of precious air that fills our lungs, she deserves to be taken care of.

That is why the Earth needs to be reminded every now and then that its friends really are its friends, and are not just using it for a free ride. A card and a bouquet of flowers are nice things to give to a friend to show them that you care, but the Earth doesn't need a card or a bouquet of flowers, it already has fields filled with flowers, and factories full of cards. What the Earth really wants for her coming Earth Day is for humans to help her out by cleaning up some of the messes they've made recently, and learn how to not make so many messes in the future. That's what she really wants.

This year, if each of us thinks about ways to limit our personal messes, perhaps the Earth will thank us, and promise to keep carrying our friends and children on its wonderful journey around the sun for a little longer. Maybe we could think about the energy we consume in our cars, and our fancy juice box packages that we throw away, and in the lights we leave on when we go outside, and the water we let run while we brush our teeth. We could think about the type of fuel we are using, and see that some are making the Earth ill, and dream of cleaner ways to run our nightlights and toasters without letting our good friend Earth have to sacrifice its health.

One thing that I hope to do for the Earth is to learn all I can about renewable energy and to find out how I can help make it more widely used. A bit of research and a few letters to some politicians is a cheap rent to pay for a summer of swimming, bike riding, Frisbee playing and everything else that is wrapped up with summer. It's a rent that I know I'm not forced to pay, but something I feel obligated to pay.

I hope the Earth will appreciate it.

Tragedy in the Statistics

Notorious dictator Joseph Staiin, no stranger to death, once declared, "The death of one person is a tragedy. The death of millions is a statistic." Today, the death of Pope John Paul II is a tragedy. But for most of us, the death of millions around the world from AIDS is a statistic.

Andrew Freedman

AIDS stands for Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome, a condition in which the body's immune system is destroyed, leaving the victim open to opportunistic infections that would ordinarily be handled easily. AIDS develops from the virus HIV — human immunodeficiency virus — which is spread through unprotected sexual contact, sharing of needles between drug users, transfusion of infected blood, and from an infected mother to her child.

AIDS has no cure, and no vaccine to prevent it, and research into these is unlikely to produce either quickly, due to the virus' extremely rapid mutation. Treatment for AIDS usually involves years of expensive antiretroviral drug therapy, and these drugs can prolong life with the disease. In the United States and other high-income nations these drugs are widely used and deaths from AIDS have fallen: although nearly one million Americans had HIV or AIDS in 2003, only an estimated 14,000 died, according to the CIA World Facebook Web site.

If the AIDS epidemic is mostly under control in our country, it is rampaging across Africa. The further south one travels down the map, the higher rates of AIDS and HIV are. At the southernmost region of Africa, in the countries of Swaziland, Botswana, South Africa, Namibia, Zimbabwe, and Lesotho, over 20 percent of the population has HIV or AIDS, according to a report by UNAIDS. In the small country of Swaziland, around 200,000 people, or 38 percent of the population, had AIDS/HIV at the end of 2003, and 17,000 had died that year.

Try to conceptualize those statistics: 38 percent, or 200,000 people. 200,000 is greater than the population of Springfield or Worcester, and around a third of the urban population of Boston. 200,000 is over eight times the student population of this campus. Next visualize every person you know, and imagine one third of them having AIDS or HIV, perhaps without even realizing it, and you'll begin to see the scope of the crisis.

... AIDS is not just a matter for governments — the sheer scale of the crisis demands a response from citizens as well.

It gets worse. Deaths from AIDS have left approximately 60,000 orphans, some undoubtedly having the disease themselves, according to UNAIDS; an estimated 15,000 households are run by orphan children. The average life expectancy is 37 years for Swaziland's population according to the World Factbook, in large part because AIDS spreads through entire families, from husband to wife or mother to child. A whole generation is growing up with the likelihood of an early death.

Although AIDS is worst in Africa, especially the far south, it is also a major problem in many other parts of the world. AIDS is spreading through Southeast Asia and China, through Eastern Europe and Russia, through Latin America and the Caribbean. In 2004, over 3 million people died from AIDS, with over 20 million total dead and nearly 40 million currently living with the virus, according to Avert.org.

What can be done? In 2003, President Bush pledged $15 billion to help fight AIDS in Africa, according to www.africaaction.org. This was a nice gesture, but it was disingenuous: some of the money went to fund research in the US, the spending didn't begin until 2004, and brand-name AIDS drugs would be purchased over cheaper generic drugs. In short, it wasn't a full $15 billion, and it wasn't a real solution.

Moreover, the Bush administration has been pushing abstinence-only programs in various countries, mostly to appeal to his Christian supporters who view premarital sex as a sin. Abstinence education, in this country and others, is a waste of resources, more of a moral statement than a coherent program; people are going to have sex, and discouraging them from doing it is fruitless. Moreover, Human Rights Watch found that these programs had been spreading falsehoods in Uganda, declaring premarital sex "deviance" and that condoms are ineffective at stopping sexual transmission of AIDS. Such lies cost lives, discouraging individuals from using condoms when they have sex, thereby facilitating the spread of the disease.

A better governmental proposal would be the disbursement of at least $20 billion every year for AIDS treatment and prevention, throughout Africa and the world. However, AIDS is not just a matter for governments — the sheer scale of the crisis demands a response from citizens as well. Speak out, raise money, volunteer — because each one of nearly 40 million people suffering from AIDS is a potential tragedy, not a statistic.

Journalism behind the lines

Embedded journalism is a concept that was first conceived during World War II, and has most recently been a primary source of information from the second Gulf War. In the context of war, the term refers to journalists who engage in a military training session, are sent to the war zone and allowed to accompany the army platoons and missions. They can do so, however, only on the grounds that their reporting does not compromise any of said missions.

Evan Mowery

I would like to hold that embedded journalism is beneficial not only to the coverage but to the stories themselves and the journalists covering them. They have been the subject of scrutiny that is a bit negative in nature recently so I'd like to throw out a nice counterpoint.

In the first Gulf War, the coverage of the front lines was spotty at best. Only after the fighting occurred and smoke cleared did the actual events have a chance to emerge. Embedded journalism solves this problem. Correspondents now live their lives, eat, sleep, and carry on into battle with those fighters. The frontline access allowed has been able to further the public's perception and overall knowledge of the war. It captures a complete mosaic of everything that occurs on the battlefield and everyone affected.

Embeds can witness firsthand the mistakes and acts of pure cruelty that these so-called virtuous individuals are inflicting on a public that has no voice.

The journalist's credo of seeking truth and reporting it is in prime example here. As Thomas E. Ricks, Military Affairs Reporter for the Washington Post says, "to accurately report war you must have witnessed it firsthand." This idea pertains not only to war but to almost anything that a journalist would hope to report. First hand experience is a universally accepted necessity for true and accurate reporting.

Among the many journalist credos, maintaining balance is of the utmost importance. Embedded journalists would have more ease in carrying this ideal out to its full extent.

When a journalist is on the outside of the war, it is easier to avoid its inevitable unpleasant aspects, such as death, destruction and the everyday face of the lives it affects. It would be all too easy to step back and declare the gulf war a thrilling victory by courageous and brave young Americans.

While this may be true to some extent, the shadowy underbelly of the war has not been exposed. Embeds can witness firsthand the mistakes and acts of pure cruelty that these so-called virtuous individuals are inflicting on a public that has no voice. An entire different portrait of the war could be painted in which the Americans were heartless, invading tyrants who decimated poor, defenseless Iraqi towns. But a journalist on the outside, looking in, that was never on the frontline, could never see either the kindness of America's forces or the tyranny that they might well have caused. The balance is severely lacking.

A benefit of embedding on a level that I believe all journalists can appreciate is the safety that comes by being surrounded by and veritably cared for by a convoy of military troops, safety that is in short supply in war torn lands. Freelance, unilateral reporters must bribe their rides and brave the hostile environment with very little protection, braving harsh and perilous terrain lacking even a bullet proof vest or a gas mask. They place themselves in serious danger simply by trying to earn their paychecks.

I would like to express my belief that embedding journalists will improve those journalists' credibility and skill as professional reporters.

As they are embedded with the soldiers and so dependent upon them for protection, a problem that journalists might encounter would be how does one stay fair and balanced and maintain a professional level of distance without allowing themselves to become emotionally attached? One could call this a problem but I prefer to call it an essential training tool for fair and balanced reporters. Such situations as reporting in war torn lands might well test their very mettle and put them in as extreme conditions as they will ever encounter in their lives. If, through all this, that level of distance can be maintained, if they can live with the soldiers, eat with the soldiers and face the battle with the soldiers, but at the end of the day, write what is needed, regardless of who it may hurt, the reporter will be that much stronger for it.

Another benefit that the journalist can hope to take from their embedding experience is to be surrounded on all sides by those patriotic and driven Americans who would love to cast the war in a favorable light by adding their own spin to certain events. The journalist must be able to see through this propaganda and focus on what the issues really are. Therefore, any chance that they might have to test their skills in such a manner can, with no doubt, be construed as beneficial.

So give them a break. That's all I ask. They're good people doing their job in a tough situation. Cheers to them.

Overwhelmed and under-communicative

You're competent, active and energetic. You can get your work done, earn money at a job and still make time for your favorite extracurricular activities. The busier you are the more the momentum of the work will carry you along. So you think and so you start your fall semester by taking on seven courses, two jobs, a weekly columnist position, and a club sport. It sounds like a lot to your Mom and friends, but the jobs are less than 15 hours per week total, three of the courses are single or two credit colloquiums, and the sport is ... well, just a club.

S.J. Port

The weeks begin to fly. The jobs are taking more time than you thought they would. In addition to your paid hours you have to spend time getting to and from work; in weekly staff meetings, and time interacting with the people you call colleagues. Most weeks you're actually spending 20-25 hours a week on "working," but still only being paid for 15. The stress of both jobs is starting to wear on you. By the time you get home at night the vision of your own homework, mounting in piles across your desk and bed, brings on a massive headache.

The three supposedly "easy" courses turn out to be more work and stress than you imagined. Your other four courses are non-stop reading and writing. You spend so much time at your computer that you develop carpal tunnel syndrome. On top of this, you've developed a strange eye infection, and have had to go home every other week to see an eye specialist in Boston. Perhaps sleep could cure the eye infection? No time to experiment.

The one happiness in your life is your hockey team. Your teammates and the exercise manage to make you smile on days when people wonder if your dog just died.

Your aunt in Indiana dies suddenly. You call the Dean of Students Office and they send out an email to all of your professors that a death in the family has occurred. For a week you miss your courses, your job, your practices and games, only to return exhausted by the travel and loss.

You are now behind in your work. You think, "It's a big University, nobody's going to notice if I only do all of this half-assed."

You'd like to drop some of your responsibilities, but you've made promises to your jobs, your teammates and yourself. You love everything you do, but are starting to hate getting out of bed — that is on the rare occasion you actually get in bed to sleep.

The semester ends and your work is not done, but you return home for break anyway — with three incompletes. You fall asleep at the Christmas dinner table; you can't stay awake for more than three hours at a time.

it's a big University, and even those of us who know it best can get lost. It's an impersonal University, and even those of us with contacts in the administration, faculty and staff can feel left behind.

If you read the above paragraphs and didn't think, "this person is nuts," then reread them — you too are probably lying to yourself about how many hours there really are in a day. The mistakes I made may seem obvious, but humor me for a moment while I spell them out.

If everything you are responsible for does not fit on a schedule (read as: chart with all the hours of all the days of the week on it) then you have to cut some things out. And, yes, you are to include sleep and self-determined study hall hours on that schedule. People will understand that you've over committed; just don't repeat the mistake every semester, learn your lesson and move on. Professors, bosses, colleagues and friends will respect that you would prefer to do a few things well than fail in your responsibilities to everyone — including them.

If you're halfway through a semester and you're pulling regular all- nighters; you're ill, depressed, struggling with personal issues, or just simply overwhelmed or disenchanted talk to your advisors and professors and make the effort to seek advice. I didn't seek advice until the semester was over and quicksand was pooling into my mouth as I began — finally — to gurgle for help. Believe it or not your professors have been in your shoes, and have heard and seen it all. They are very likely to understand if you approach them honestly; do not make up stories or exaggerate circumstances — a good lie is always harder to tell than the truth. Approach your professors with respect for their authority but also with an understanding of how deep you're under and how long it will realistically take to finish the course — if you can finish it. Suggest, but do not demand, a time frame in which to have the work done.

If you cannot finish the course, lay it out with the professor and your dean. You can withdraw from a course with a late withdrawal until the last week of a semester. Students also have the option to retroactively withdrawal after the conclusion of a semester in some serious cases. (Most advisors at the University will tell you that "serious" cases are not rarities by any means.) Again, go to these advisors with an idea of what would help you most, instead of just a pitiful empty pout.

If you bring honest reasons for your predicament to the administration they will be honest and reasonable in return. If they are not, which in my own experience is rare, go to your dean, you advisor, the dean of student life and so on — hell, email Lombardi as a last ditch effort — but first respect the hierarchy of authority.

Quitting a job is easier than you think. Your foremost job during college is not to make money, build a resume or understand the professional universe. Your foremost job is to get the most out of your courses, learn to be a student and thinker, and focus your interests while expanding your view of the world through the lens of your chosen field. If you work to pay for school consider extra loans. The financial aid office will be able to help you, if you actually show up in person instead of barraging them with emails and phone calls. You already have a career as a student, anything on top of that is a second, third or fourth job.

That said, it's rare that anyone can handle and succeed in more than five courses at once. Expect to take summer or winter courses if you want to graduate in four years but are a double major, or someone who needs to take fewer than the expected five courses each semester. Be careful about the courses you chose. Lay out a plan to graduate in time with an advisor.

If you've never met your advisor — or an advisor of some kind — what are you waiting for? Better yet, what are you paying tuition for? Don't feel like you're wasting your professor, advisor, coach, or boss' time by dropping in to talk to them or to ask for help; most of them hold office hours for students who never show up.

It's a big University, and even those of us who know it best can get lost. It's an impersonal University, and even those of us with contacts in the administration, faculty and staff can feel left behind. But those of you who know when to ask for help — and get over your own egos to do so — will get the most out of this University.

Weather affecting mood?

Today, in Amherst, the weather is a cool 48 degrees and slightly cloudy. People in Key West, Fla. are enjoying a sunny 75 degree day. Which would you prefer? I am sure that they majority of you would choose Key West.

Joshua Stephens

In general, sunnier, warmer weather has a positive affect on a person's mood and colder, cloudier weather has a negative affect. Some can develop Seasonal Affective Disorder, also known as fall-winter onset and a spring-summer remission.

Seasonal Affective Disorder is thought to have a direct relationship to weather. It actually does not; SAD appears in people when the seasons change. It is a rare disorder and is thought to be related to the body's temperature and hormone regulation. It is known to occur more with women than men. People with this disorder experience depression with fall or winter onset. They may gain weights and have a lessened drive to do anything. SAD can be treated with light therapy. Most people with the "winter blahs" or cabin fever do not have SAD.

Weather does play a role in determining mood. Although it might not be as direct as some think, it is definitely there.

Many believe that weather affects mood, but this is not necessarily true. According to Mathew Keller, a University of Michigan post-doctoral researcher, "Everyone thinks weather affects mood, but the biggest tests of this theory in 2000 found no relationship, so we went back and found there are two important variables: how much time you spend outside and what the season is. If you go from winter to spring and spend enough time outside, there's a noticeable change (www.sciencedaily.com)."

Keller and his colleagues collected and analyzed information from many different studies, in order to further investigate this theory. He found that the perfect temperature for Americans was about seventy-two degrees. Also in his findings, he discovered that people must spend at least 30 minutes outside in nice weather for their mood to actually increase.

Seeing spring is around the corner, it is important for people, especially college kids, to make an everyday attempt to go outside for at least a 30-minute period. Doing this can help your overall health by "improving mood, memory and broadening cognitive style (Keller)." The University of Michigan also found that by staying indoors, while the weather outside is nice, may actually decrease mood and cognitive ability (sciencedaily.com).

Being a college student at a large populated university, I see thousands of people everyday. Not only do I see them, I see the emotions and moods that they wear on their sleeves. It's noticeable that spring is bringing out better moods in people. After talking to a few people, they also agreed that the nice weather has made them noticeably happier. I asked Kevin Kelleher, a friend of mine, how weather has affected him? "The sun gives me initiative to do things. I wake up in a better mood and look forward to getting outside." Kevin simply replied.

This winter has been an extremely long one and with spring finally arriving, people are smiling more and have more interest to do work and go to classes. Although Mathew Keller believes that there in no direct relationship with weather affecting mood, I believe that just by the sun being out, moods are boosted. Weather does play a role in determining mood. Although it might not be as direct as some think, it is definitely there.

Laundry, posers and pee-bombs

Defenestration: a throwing of a person or thing out of a window.

Dylan Smith

A heap of boxers would be the sight every few weeks in the "kid's" bathroom in my house, nestled in the corner by the sink. I was elementary school age, still sporting the sweet one shoulder backpack, and I blamed this pile of dirty underwear on laziness after morning showers. But it was really an excuse to argue with my parents, and eventually, a chance to see laundry fly. Well, not fly, but at least defy the weight of gravity for a brief and glorious moment. The pile would grow and grow, and after a few weeks it was time for D-Day.

D-Day, often on a Sunday morning, was my parent's nonsense approach for the quick disposal of the foul smelling undergarments that were decomposing by the sink. A voice would yell, "Dylan, Mom's about to defenestrate your boxers!" I would race to the second floor bathroom, hoping to catch a glimpse of it. "Defenestration Day" was serious entertainment. My mother, or whoever, would scoop up the boxers, and simply heave them out the window. "No, Mom, I was about to pick them up!" I would exclaim in my best dramatic yelp. I would watch them flutter down to the garden below in a scattered fashion. Quietly, I would walk outside and collect them, trying to hide the huge grin that was plastered across my face.

At twelve, there was a week of school in May where we had a substitute teacher in algebra that was notoriously late for class. Since he was a rather corpulent fellow, and our class followed lunch, we speculated that perhaps his frequent trips to Taco Bell detained him. In this portion of class where grade D meat was sliding down Mr. Jamieson's esophagus, the most popular way to pass the time among the segregated boys side of the classroom was paper football.

I had an embarrassing experience earlier in the year with paper football that affirmed my burgeoning adolescent existence of awkwardness. I didn't realize that you shouldn't put the uprights directly in front of your face and took a direct hit to the cornea. Luckily my sight returned, but my social status was under review by the board. I was currently a "poser," which sucked. Trying to avoid another unfortunate incident, and maintain my tenuous position in middle school's social hierarchy, I opted to make paper airplanes and toss them out of the window to pass the time.

They would sail swiftly along the fresh vernal breeze as I daydreamed about the "Saved By the Bell" episodes I would watch that afternoon on TBS. I imagined I floated along with these airplanes, trusting the wind to guide me through the air. I had never stopped to notice if, or where, these planes had landed.

On the Friday of that week, I watched my first flight start to finish. The wind suddenly stopped, my airplane dropped rather clumsily and slammed into a tree. I leaned out the window to see my airplane crippled, with the nose scrunched up like an accordion. Apparently the wind, like posers before it, also sucked sometimes. Distraught from this reality, I returned to my desk and put "Thriller" in my Discman. As the words of "Beat It" rang in my ears, paper footballs occasionally crossed my field of vision in a parabolic arc (approximately $y=2x+4$ as estimated by my TI-83 that day, in between games of mofrog).

Someone will take a snapshot of me flaunting a wide grin as I soar amongst the clouds, giving thumbs up for the camera with one hand and the middle finger for Whitmore with the other.

As a sophomore in college, the window in my dorm room broke during the winter, so my roommate knocked the screen off to shut it. This unscreened window soon became the single source of all litter surrounding Emerson Dorm that spring. College binge drinking abetted this new mutation of D-Day.

My friends and I would get drunk and launch our bottles out of the window. Then we would have to pee, but the bathroom was all the way down the hall, so we'd urinate in the empty bottles and throw those out the window. These pee bombs would explode on the rocks below, and we would all cheer of course.

We were half-hoping that an RA would come with a complaint. "At approximately 3:45 a.m. on Tuesday, March 5, it was reported that beer bottles of urine were being thrown from your window in 334 Emerson."

The next Defenestration Day is almost here. However, D-Day on May 22 won't involve any boxers, paper airplanes, or pee bombs (well, I wouldn't rule this one out). I weigh about 200 pounds, so, I'll need at least five or six people to actually pick me up for a good toss out of the window. "Ok, we're going to need bottle-peers on the legs, underwear-disposers for the shoulders!" I'll try to study the currents as much as possible that day, but in the end I'm sure I'll just scream, "Throw me!" And they'll heave me into that familiar spring air, with my best "Superman" pose possible (Christopher Reeves-era).

This flight will be all my own, with the defenestrating party eagerly leaning out of the window. Someone will take a snapshot of me flaunting a wide grin as I soar amongst the clouds, giving thumbs up for the camera with one hand and the middle finger for Whitmore with the other. I also might throw in some Jordan inspired tongue-hanging-out action. My gown and cape (worn for superhero effect) will flap in the wind.

And I don't worry about the possibility of a crash landing anymore. I mean, do you think I'm an idiot? I'll scrounge up some mattresses or something from the dumpster in my parking lot that morning, it's cool. You think I would let people just throw me out of a window like that without taking any precautionary measures? Especially drunk pee-bombers? I mean I am getting a degree in history. So, please, spare me the "Jackass" comments. It's covered. Anyway, at least I know I can hire a plastic surgeon for the nose job if anything else. This is America isn't it? Just look at Michael Jackson, now that's the American dream in action. Just beat it, beat it, beat it, duh duh duh ...

The Left's grand strategy

The days of Bill Clinton's stardom have, kicking and screaming, come to a close. Even as the Democratic "rock star" boards a plane to attend the Pope's funeral in Rome, Clinton's days of romping through the White House in all his tawdry glory are long gone. What's more, the Democrats' most recent hero in the crusade against Bush, John Kerry, had only received tepid support from the New York Times editorial page and even some staunch Bush haters. It seems as though Mr. Kerry, not President Bush and his campaigning cronies, gave Americans a growing list of reasons as to why we should continue to call him Senator.

Sean Drummy

Some have argued that it is only a matter of time until a Liberal backlash sweeps through the "red states" in light of Bush's deep push into America's moral and economic principles. However, as Machiavelli once put it: "A man should never risk failing because he thinks it is likely that he will be rescued." But that is precisely what the Left and their "the Neo-Cons are doing themselves in" attitude is banking on. With the University of Massachusetts being a place of higher learning, one would expect that the editorial page of the Collegian and all other forms of local media would be teeming with new ideas to revitalize the Left's grand strategy. Someone, somewhere has to be thinking up a game plan that will put the Democrats back on the offensive and give Bush and his religious rightwing nut jobs what's coming to them. While in this bubble of Liberalism, this isolated chunk of the world that champions "free thought" and "innovative ideas" (provided it isn't Conservative, of course), it may look as if the rest of the country is right on the same page as the politically minded here.

The politics of ridicule, scorn, and contempt do not impress anyone, especially the voters that were undecided up until the last stages of the elections. Continuing the daily retinue of diatribes and conspiracy theories against Bush. .. is futile, or even risible.

This is not so.

Whether it be Michael Moore showing off his impressive repertoire of French film awards and bolstering his eating disorder with revenue from "Fahrenheit 911" or the troves of protesters turning out for the Republican National Convention to give Arnold and pals a piece of their Leftist minds,' the Left is bringing nothing to the political table and they are paying dearly for it. And what of the validity of the Left's grievances? One would be hard pressed to find a Republican that believes his or her party has the monopoly on all the right answers. Many of the criticisms brought up in Left-of-Center documentaries like "Hijacking Catastrophe" may very well prove accurate. However, these ceaseless attacks on Conservatives didn't get any more seats in Congress or, yes I'll beat this dead political horse once again, a Democratic president.

What this past round of elections teaches us is that disdain for the incumbent, no matter how intense it may appear here, will not propel a similarly lackluster candidate into that big, round office in the White House. The politics of ridicule, scorn, and contempt do not impress anyone, especially the voters that were undecided up until the last stages of the elections. Continuing the daily retinue of diatribes and conspiracy theories against Bush and all his accomplishments is futile, or even risible. I know I have had a good laugh or two at some of the political editorials I've read in the Collegian. Not because I found the author's point to be invalid, but because incessant groveling does more to keep my Republican friends and I entertained than to help undo the "unspeakable evils" of the Bush administration. I find it very hard to believe that vindictive responses to conservative opinions expressed either in this paper or Fox News (the worst "F" word on campus) are met with worry and insecurity by their authors. Indeed, the whining and frustrated tirades that come on a weekly basis have now truly reached an intolerable, vapid state. This is an institution of "innovation" and "higher thought"?

Stop complaining and prove it.

Making Waves

Britain's latest rock act echoes 'Processed Beats' of hip-hop and classic rock

By Carey Zigouras
Collegian Correspondent

An explosive combination of electronic dance beats and indie rock, Kasabian's self-titled debut album will attract fans of both these genres. The catchiness of certain songs, especially in the beginning of the album, will attract others. The band, named after the prime witness in the Charles Manson case, Linda Kasabian, lures listeners when they discover information such as this and this has helped create their mysterious image to attract listeners.

The band hails from Leicester, England and consists of lead singer Tom Meighan, Sergio Pizzorno on lead guitar and keyboards, Christopher Karloff on guitar and keyboards, and Chris Edwards on bass. Together, these four Brits have created music heavily influenced by Primal Scream and The Stone Roses and hope to bring this sound to America ... even though we've already heard it. However, Kasabian does show that they are brilliant interpreters of their influences, and this record demonstrates their potential to develop their own individuality.

The record opens strongly with "Club Foot," a track that begins with an opening electronic sound that builds up into the harder beat. We are introduced to Tom Meighan's voice that sounds like Liam Gallagher of Oasis, who the band has toured with. Choosing to repeat simple lines and phrases in a drone-like way adds to the mood they are trying to create.

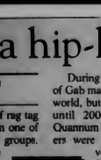
The next track speeds up the space-like mysterious sounds of "Club Foot" into more of a dance song. It's hard not to be turned on to the catchiness of the rising and falling of the beats on tracks like "Processed Beats." The lyrics aren't particularly mind-blowing on any of the tracks, but their simple style of creating captivating rhythms is what makes them rock in the beginning of the album.

"I.D." is a standout track on the album. The opening begins with what sounds like a video game but beautifully morphs into a more ethereal sound. The shift from the previous dance track into an series of undulating beats which smoothly wander into one another show their versatility. Even more effective is the subtle guitar strokes at certain moments throughout the song that add another layer to the music without overdoing it.

The slow, short intro to "Cutt Off" is so intriguing that disappointment ensued when the actual song kicked in. By this point the songs start to sound no different than the other tracks. Meighan's rambling of lyrics might be more effective if he chose to utilize his voice more than speaking. The echoing of the lyrics by the other band members is also too similar to the droning found on earlier tracks and is without the energy found on those songs. This pattern continues on the rest of the record.

"Butcher Blues" at first seems like an interesting take on the blues with an untraditional sound. However, the repetition of "I just can't stop losing control" left behind a burdem that even an electronic take on the blues couldn't prevent. At this point the energy from the beginning of the album has been spent. The intensity from the beginning of the record reappears again at the second-to-last track "Ovary Stripe." But overall the second half is much less vibrant than the first.

Because the album starts off so strong, it is a bit of a disappointment midway when the fuel runs out too soon. However, the beginning of the album is still worth a listen. Meighan has a lot of potential to use his voice more rather than speaking. Kasabian has an allure that has the potential to be enhanced, as the beginning of the album alone shows that they are onto something. With more developed lyrics and stylistic tuning they might have the listener for keeps.



Across the pond

Kasabian's United States debut album combines elements from Oasis, DJ Shadow, and the Rolling Stones. Their first single "Clubfoot" opened on the British Pop Music charts at number 5.

California hip-hop arrives in NoHo

By Nathan Rothstein
Collegian Staff

In the early-1990s, a group of rag tag musicians came together to form one of hip-hop's first California hippie groups. The Pharcyde, hailing from the Oakland area, broke into the national scene with Bizzarre Ride in 1992. The group featured exciting rhyming; soulful hooks and maybe the best hip hop song of all time: "Passing Me By." Pharcyde was able to tell their story with dynamic lyrics, but also use innovative music techniques.

A half a decade later, another group from northern California came together to revive their hip-hop scene. For several years, they stayed below the radar scene, but with the help of Okayplayer.com, they hit the hip-hop big time in 2002. The group, Blackalicious, consists of an emcee and a disc jockey. Rightfully so, the emcee has picked a name true to his style. Gift of Gab, who is a pleasure to listen to when he is on the microphone, is smooth, calm and eloquent.

During the mid-90s, DJ Xcel and Gift of Gab made noise in the hip-hop underworld, but did not make a studio album until 2000. Before their signing by Quannum Records in 1999, music listeners were attracted to Gab's articulate voice and ability to master the English language and Xcel's use of jazzy, funky, hip hop beats. The problem many times with underground hip-hop is the lack of musical understanding from the artists. Great hip-hop is a combination of many genres of music, and Blackalicious is a group that understands variety. Building from their first album, the group continued to test their musical limits on their second album, Blazing Arrow. With the help of Jurassic 5, Jaguar Wright, Ben Harper and Gill Scott-Heron, this group made one of the premier hip-hop albums of 2002. The album also included the production of Questlove from The Roots and Cut Chemist of Jurassic 5. On the songs "Nowhere Fast" and "Aural Pleasure" Blackalicious finds the neo-soul sound, but also makes it their own.

Spring boarding from his success with Blackalicious, Gift of Gab began to work on a solo project. Last May, he released his first solo album, "4th Dimensional Rocketship is Going Up." As hip hop history shows, only a few former group members can hold their own on a solo project, and Gab does just that. His rhymes are elegant, and his voice remains assertive, but also laid back. It is a unique sound that allows him to grow as an artist and continues to impress people with his exquisite tongue twisters.

Tonight Gift of Gab will perform at Pearl Street. Joining him on stage will be Lateef the Truth Speaker, who as his name suggests, speaks nothing but the truth. Lateef is a member of the California hip-hop underworld and has appeared on both Blackalicious albums. He is also a member of the hip-hop group Latryx, who made a couple songs in the late 1990s, but were pushed to the side by one record company after another. Now, after making his name known with Blackalicious, Lateef is ready to show fans, he is actually the truth. If you are doubting these rappers names, or just want to hear some fun, low key hip hop, jump on Bus 43, and head to Pearl Street.

Former student athlete starts program to help people of Nigeria

By Darryl E. Owens
The Orlando Sentinel

ORLANDO, Fla. — Boma Ekiyor had been abroad for two years, but when the University of Central Florida student returned to Nigeria in 1999 to visit his family, he realized little had changed.

As before, the same pockets of wealth. Same pockets of poverty. Same political instability.

What had changed was his outlook.

"I would go to the areas of extreme wealth and go, 'Wow. Look at these houses, they're beautiful,' and then go to areas that were slummy and go, 'Oh my goodness, this is terrible.' I kind of saw a lot of the things that I thought were normal (while growing up) as real issues."

Six years later, Ekiyor, 28, plans to change mindsets with a concept conceived during that enlightening Nigerian trip.

The former University of Central Florida football star has launched Youth Converts, a foundation that will be set up in Africa and use sports as a carrot to teach Nigerian children leadership and conflict-resolution skills. The goal: impelling future generations to transform the turbulent region.

The maiden mission, contingent on grants and the largesse of a fund-raiser at UCF, is planned for July.

Growing up under tyrants, Ekiyor saw beatings and heard whispers of deadly reprisals that illustrated how evil flourishes when good men do nothing.

The remedy, he says, lies in an often co-opted African maxim.

"It takes a village to raise a child, Africans came up with that proverb," he says. "It's something that Africans need to re-embrace because that's the only thing that's going to help African countries."

SOCIETY OF OPPRESSION

Nigeria is Africa's most populous country, a republic still reeling from the ravages of colonialism. Independence from England came in 1960, and in 1963, Nigeria became a republic. However, two coups in 1966 ended civil government and ushered in a military regime.

In 1976, a year after another coup ousted that regime, Ekiyor was born. His father, Edward, a lawyer, soon moved the family from the Niger Delta to Lagos, the capital. Because of his father's station, Ekiyor enjoyed the comforts of upper-middle class life, including an Anglican education, a vestige of colonial days.

But not even his status shielded Ekiyor from Nigeria's turmoil. He remembers that during one coup, he and his siblings were forbidden from venturing outside "because my parents were afraid of stray bullets."

Order was implemented by the fist. Once, a solider boarded a bus and refused to pay. When the driver pressed for the fare, the solider dragged him into the streets. Ekiyor watched in horror as the man kicked the driver.

"It was harrowing," he says. "You saw it all the time."

Nigerians, he says, hoisted soldiers onto a pedestal. Uniforms signified power. Kids dreamed of suiting up and pressing a boot on the neck of citizens.

"It was terrible because you're in a society growing up, and you see all these things, and you don't see anyone doing anything about it," he recalls. "You almost accept that oppression is the way of things, that's the way it's supposed to be."

Not everyone accepted that standard. Speak out against things you don't like, Edward Ekiyor coached his kids.

"I saw how he handled himself," Ekiyor says, "and that gave me confidence."

It was a confidence he expected to carry to Lagos State University. But, his plans changed when the school was shuttered after a deadly power grab.

His fallback: coming to America.

COMMUNITY CHALLENGE

At Bethune-Cookman College in Daytona Beach, Fla., Ekiyor discovered football. After a year, he transferred to the University of Central Florida, on the advice of his father, who suggested he taste diversity. Besides, his brother, Emil, was a football star at UCF.

As a defensive end at UCF, Boma Ekiyor became expert at delivering hard tackles to change the direction of running backs. But, after that 1999 trip, he couldn't shake a calling to change the direction of Nigerian youth.

In Nigeria, he says, "community involvement is not huge. They'd rather blame the military government and say people in government are stealing money and are corrupt. I mean, they are," he gives a sardonic laugh, "but that's not the sole reason. You have to start taking responsibility."

Not that he had the answer for Nigeria's ills. All he knew was that his time in the States "kind of changed my mentality a little bit, whereas as an individual, I knew I could actually wake up and do something."

After graduating from UCF with a degree in international business and marketing in 2002, he consulted his sister, Thelma Ekiyor, who was working with West African Network for Peacebuilding, which teaches conflict resolution, and brother Emil, who had formed a charitable foundation.

From that, the plan for Youth Converts was mapped.

PRACTICAL LESSONS

After about 16 years of military rule, Nigeria returned to civilian rule under President Olusegun Obasanjo in 1999. He won a second term in a turbulent 2003 election, Nigeria's first civilian transfer of power.

COURTESY PHOTO/BETH HOD

Nigerian-born Boma Ekiyor made his way through college as a defensive end on the University of Central Florida's football team. He has developed a program using sports to teach children conflict management skills.

Obasanjo has investigated human-rights abuses under martial rule, freed political prisoners and targeted corruption. Ekiyor praises his presidency, credit tempered with reality: Obasanjo faces the burden of easing the country's tribal and religious clashes.

Likewise, there are myriad grass-roots issues facing sub-Saharan Africa. Ekiyor concedes many non-native groups are doing good work in Africa. "but it's gotten to the point where (Africans) just look outward and say, 'Someone help us, someone help us.'"

Ekiyor plans to make oversight trips to Nigeria, but he envisions Youth Converts becoming a self-sustaining empowerment group, administered by Nigerians. The mission: teaching leadership and conflict resolution.

"For someone like Mr. Ekiyor to go back to his homeland and be able to bring hope and joy to so many youth is quite admirable," says Larry Curry, a Youth Converts advisory board member. Its mission mirrors that of the Center for Urban Leadership and Community Development, an Orlando faith-based family- and community-empowerment group that Curry founded. "I believe (Ekiyor) desires to be a voice to a generation who has no voice."

The foundation's first project involves teaching children in the oil-rich Niger Delta, ravaged by deforestation and tarred by oil spills, practical ways of approaching community and environmental concerns.

Youth Converts will adopt a curriculum developed by Roots & Shoots, a global environmental and community-service program founded by Jane Goodall to inspire youth. To combat the growing pollution and deforestation in the Niger Delta, Youth Converts will lead kids in tree-planting and water-purification projects. Meanwhile, West African Network for Peacebuilding will teach conflict resolution.

It all comes wrapped in a sports ribbon. "Sports is a major instrument for drawing youth away from their negative ways," Ekiyor says. The draw in July will be a basketball exhibition at a Nigerian gym, and with luck, Ekiyor hopes the Youth Converts will help "create sport complexes and create educated citizens through sport."

Why should Americans care?

For one thing, enlightened self-interest: "Nigerian oil powers many of our cars and industries," says Sheryl King, a Youth Converts board member.

Indeed, Nigeria is the fifth largest supplier of oil to the United States. Americans should realize, Ekiyor says, that political unrest in Nigeria can have a big effect in this country.

"What if the pumps were shut off for months?" he says. "African issues are something I think people need to pay attention to."

Sending Priority Mail? Read the fine print before licking the stamps

By Dave Lieber
Knight Ridder Newspapers

FORT WORTH, Texas — Celeste Rogers of Arlington, Texas, says she is done with the United States Postal Service. As done as an old 34-cent stamp. "I'm never using the post office again except for stamps," she says.

Her problem? She learned the hard way that Priority Mail is not always a priority.

Because she didn't read the fine print on the big sign at the local post office, she didn't realize that the advertised "2-3 days average delivery time" is no guarantee. But even the fine print is not much help.

"Some restrictions apply," the sign states.

What does that mean?

For Rogers, a Tarrant County, Texas, law enforcement investigator, it means that for the past week the single mom and her son thought he had lost the chance to compete for a college scholarship. Her son, Dylan, a high school senior, needs every penny he can muster to pay for college.

Rogers believed she was ahead of the game when her persistent nagging of Dylan to finish his essay for a foundation based in Midland, Texas, paid off. He completed the scholarship application, and she took it to the post office.

The application said the envelope must be postmarked no later than March 29. She mailed it March 24, so she thought she was golden.

But just to be sure, she paid $4.30 for Priority Mail: the standard $3.85 rate, plus 45 cents for tracking and delivery confirmation.

On March 31, the day before the deadline for receipt of the applications, she checked the tracking number on her computer. The package had not been delivered.

When she complained to the post office, she says a postal worker told her, "It's still in transit."

She recalled responding, "If I had put a stamp on it, it would have been there already."

"Yeah, you're right," was the postal worker's answer, she says. "But you should have sent it Express Mail, because it's not guaranteed."

She felt like April Fool's Day had come a day early.

She contacted this column, which relishes the chance to learn something new. On occasion, I use Priority Mail, too, thinking the promised two- to three-day delivery is the real deal.

But PostalWatch, a Virginia-based advocacy group that monitors the postal service, conducted a study of Priority Mail in 2003. Rick Merritt, the group's executive director, told me that promises about Priority Mail constitute "less than truthful advertising."

He added, "The postal service has left the American people with the belief that Priority Mail is an equivalent service to two-day service from a private service. That is not true."

His study concluded that "the Postal Service has misrepresented Priority Mail for nearly a decade. ... Consumers derive no tangible benefit by sending a letter via Priority Mail versus First-Class Mail."

Three years ago, the Postal Rate Commission's consumer advocate reported, "Approximately 33 percent of 3-day Priority Mail is not delivered by the end of the third day."

As a solution, PostalWatch recommends using a 37-cent stamp instead of paying the higher cost.

That's unfair, says Boyd McKinney, postal service spokesman for North Texas. With Priority Mail, he says, the mailed piece gets special packaging, hand sorting rather than machine sorting and "it actually flies in many cases, as opposed to getting trucked."

And then there's tracking and delivery confirmation.

Which, sadly, gave Celeste Rogers, well, nothing.

Within the Fort Worth postal district (Fort Worth and Arlington and west to Abilene, Lubbock and Amarillo), McKinney said, statistics for 2004 show that the two- or three-day delivery goal was met about nine out of 10 times.

But Midland, farther west, is in another region, and sometimes, he said, "in a small market, there are transportation problems."

McKinney told me to read the sign's line print more carefully.

"It doesn't say, 'Two days guaranteed,'" he said. "It says, 'Two to three days average.'"

Rogers, who made a lot of calls to complain, says that if she hears one more postal worker tell her, "It's not guaranteed," she will scream.

"I am furious," she says. "My head is about to explode."

Her son says, "I am pretty angry, too, but my mom more than compensated for me."

The spokesman told this column that the postal service made two errors: The package wasn't scanned when it left the Midland station, if, in fact, it ever did. The other is apparent non-delivery.

The postal spokesman added, "We are prepared to provide a note to the foundation for Ms. Rogers and ask that the foundation would waive the deadline and accept their application."

The foundation told Rogers Thursday that it would allow her to send a second application.

She still wants others to know that the post office is "advertising this Priority Mail as something that it isn't."

Her solution?

"FedEx," she says.

So you know: a two-day package to Midland — guaranteed — costs $9.08 with DHL Express and $8.63 through FedEx. UPS doesn't handle two-day delivery from Rogers' local post office to Midland.

Express Mail through the postal service, which includes insurance, is $13.65 and up.

Co-Ed cycling: Going where the boys go

COURTESY KARL FROELICH

Suzie Goodwin, of Plano, Texas, as the Superdrome in Frisco, Texas, prepares for practice on an indoor track. Recently cycling has grown in popularity due to the Summer Olympics and the success of Lance Armstrong in the Tour de France.

By Paula LaVigne
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — OK, guys, you like cycling ahead anyhow, so go.

Go on. Git. See ya later, hot shots.

All right, ladies, listen up.

Don't you just hate that? You're cycling along at a pretty good pace when the testosterone rushes by in a pack of wannabe Lance Armstrongs.

And you wonder, "Will I ever be able to keep up?"

Basic physiology puts women at a disadvantage. We have less lung capacity and muscle mass, which is why experts say the top male cyclists will continue to speed past the top female cyclists.

But that doesn't mean you can't hang with the boys.

Just think like Armstrong.

Kristin Armstrong, that is.

Kristin Armstrong (no relation to Lance) is a member of the T-Mobile Professional Cycling Team. The Boise, Idaho, resident also competed in the 2004 Olympics in Athens, Greece.

Even she knows what it's like to be left behind by the guys sometimes, but she says women can use the gender gap to their advantage.

"It's not a physical thing. It's a mental barrier," she says. "You have to go there with confidence. I always figure to get stronger I have to train with the men, and I don't want to hold them back."

Kristin Armstrong says women need to come into coed cycling knowing all the basics such as how to fix a flat, how to ride a straight line and how to communicate with other cyclists.

Start out cycling in small groups of women to get over the initial wariness of riding in a pack, she advises. And take advantage of any special women's bike clinics.

She mentions one forming in her town where women learn what type of bike to buy, what to eat and drink and how to ride together.

"I think that's a great step in the right direction for women because there's a lot of women out there who want to be lit on the bike but don't know how to integrate themselves in these groups of men," she says.

Women should learn to see training with men as an opportunity to push themselves to be faster and stronger, says Plano, Texas, cyclist Suzie Goodwin. Goodwin has won multiple women's cycling events and has set world records at the master's level.

You can often catch her zipping around Frisco's Superdrome track, where her husband, Tim Goodwin, is the track director.

"When you're the strongest woman ... you can go race with the men, and there are obviously men who are stronger than you are," she says. "I think it's easier for women to improve and get stronger than it is for men. A woman can go and train with the guys, and no one thinks anything of it."

At first, though, women cyclists have to be OK with not being able to keep up and sometimes being "dropped" or left behind, she says. As women improve, they'll find that they can keep up with some of the men, she says.

"In reality, women are one-third weaker in the upper body and almost equal in the lower body," she says. "We don't ride as fast, but the gap is closing as the stronger the women in general become."

For women who want to take that drive beyond making a point with their male counterparts, there are several racing opportunities both locally and nationally, says Jim Miller, director for the women's endurance program with USA Cycling in Colorado Springs, Colo.

A lot depends on how you're naturally built, he says, but capable women cyclists generally reach peak performance faster than men.

Women are likely to be older than men when they start racing, and that's often because cycling is their second sport, Miller says. The average age for the women starting on the U.S. national team is about 30, he says.

Both Kristin Armstrong, 31, and Suzie Goodwin, 38, came to cycling second. Armstrong was a triathlete, but had to switch to a lower-impact sport after osteoarthritis was diagnosed in her hips in 2001.

In-line speed skating was Goodwin's first love, but she switched to cycling after it became almost impossible to find speed-skating sponsors.

Women's cycling still doesn't garner the attention or sponsorship money that men's cycling does. And most people don't even know there's a women's version of the Tour de France.

The trend in more women pursuing the sport, despite the obstacles, does make it feel more personable, Kristin Armstrong says. She recalls watching a race in Idaho where the announcer called out the women's names as they cycled past, and before she named their sponsor she announced the cyclist's profession. That doesn't happen in men's races, Armstrong says.

"About 75 to 80 percent of these women were doctors, lawyers, nurses," she says. "They had stuff figured out in life, but their passion was bike racing and they're making that happen."

So, ladies, what are you waiting for? Those men really aren't that far ahead anymore.

RIAA to sue 25 UMass downloaders

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The super-fast "Internet2" network that connects universities researching the next-generation Internet is also apparently popular among college students who download pirated music and movies.

Entertainment groups said Tuesday they intend to sue hundreds of students accused of illegally distributing copyrighted songs and films across college campuses using the private research network, which boasts speeds hundreds of times faster than the Internet.

How much faster? Internet2 researchers once demonstrated they can download a DVD-quality copy of the popular movie "The Matrix" in 30 seconds over their network, a feat they said would take roughly 25 hours over the Internet.

The Recording Industry Association of America, the trade group for the largest labels, said it will file federal lawsuits Wednesday against 405 students at 18 colleges — including four in Massachusetts — with access to the Internet2 network. The Motion Picture Association of America said it will file an unspecified number of lawsuits against Internet2 users.

The recording industry said it found evidence of more illegal activity at 140 more schools in 41 states and sent warning letters to university presidents.

The RIAA is filing suits against 25 students at Boston University, 11 at Harvard, 22 at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and 25 at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst.

RIAA spokesman Jonathan Lamy said students are identified in the lawsuits by their Internet protocol addresses and that the association plans to seek court orders requiring schools to disclose the names.

"We don't know who they are," Lamy said, "but it's possible students have been contacted already by the universities."

MIT spokeswoman Denise Brehm said the school contacted about 20 individuals who are targets of the RIAA lawsuits and advised them to reach out to a lawyer.

"But we're not taking (disciplinary) action against them," she added.

UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said students at the Amherst campus are required to sign a written agreement saying they won't use the high-speed system to access or distribute copyrighted material.

"We take very seriously our responsibility to manage our network," he said. "This is clearly a widespread cultural and social problem."

Internet2 is used by several million university students, researchers and professionals around the world but is generally inaccessible to the public.

"We don't condone or support illegal file-sharing," said Internet2's chief executive, Doug Van Houweling. "We've always understood that just like there is a lot of file-sharing going on on the public Internet, there's also some file-sharing going on on Internet2."

The recording industry said some students were illegally sharing across Internet2 as many as 13,600 music files — far more than most Internet users — and that the average number of songs offered illegally by the students was 2,300 each.

"We cannot let this high-speed network become a zone of lawlessness where the normal rules don't apply," said Cary Sherman, president of the recording association.

Van Houweling cautioned universities against filtering data to block illegal activity in ways that would slow the network's performance.

He said Internet2 does not attempt to screen illegal files from the vast amounts of data flowing over the network because of technical limitations and privacy concerns. He said Internet2 also enjoys liability protection in the courts as long as the organization can't be shown to be responsible for material flowing over the network.

"It's possible to attack this problem in ways that do compromise the performance," Van Houweling said.

The lawsuits illustrate the aggressiveness of the entertainment industry in trying to stifle piracy even on up-and-coming technologies, as it continues to individually sue thousands of computer users accused of sharing copyrighted songs and films over the public Internet.

The recording industry said the lawsuits also pierce the perception by Internet2 researchers that they operate in a closed environment that entertainment groups can't monitor.

"We are putting students and administrators everywhere on notice that there are consequences for unlawful uses of this special network," Sherman said.

The RIAA declined to explain how it could detect piracy over Internet2 except to say it acted lawfully. Internet2's corporate members include Warner Brothers Entertainment Inc., a subsidiary of Time Warner Inc., a leading music label.

Even Internet2 officials said they were unaware how the entertainment companies traced the purportedly illegal activity on their network.

"They haven't shared with us," Van Houweling said. "We have provided no special access to any of those organizations that would enable them in some nonstandard way to gain access to this information."

Harvard spokesman Joe Wrinn said students are warned that they risk losing their Internet access if they are caught illegally distributing copyrighted material.

"We encourage students to follow the law," he said. "When they don't, they suffer the consequences."

DiMarco still without major

reason for that.

He had at least joined some exclusive company Sunday, even if it's not the kind he wants to keep.

Not since Tom Watson at the 1978 PGA Championship and 1979 Masters has someone lost back-to-back major championships in a playoff. Craig Wood is the only other player with that distinction, having lost in 38 holes in the finals of the 1934 PGA Championship, then in a 36-hole playoff to Gene Sarazen at the 1935 Masters.

Sarazen got into the playoff with a shot that put the Masters on the map, a 4-wood for double eagle on the 15th. Woods ultimately got into a playoff with a shot for the ages. His chip behind the 16th green made a U-turn at the top of the slope, came to a full stop at the edge of the cup and then got the green light from above, drupping in for birdie.

DiMarco is the first player since Tom Lehman to play in the final group of a major at least two straight years without winning. Lehman was in the last group at four straight U.S. Opens, and had at least a share of the lead in three of them.

Now, DiMarco must be careful to avoid joining the wrong crowd.

"I think I proved to a lot of people that I can play under the heat," the runner-up said.

That wasn't DiMarco, though.

Those words came from Bob May after he matched Woods shot-for-shot in high drama at Valhalla in the 2000 PGA Championship, the only other major Woods won in a playoff.

Golf is loaded with players who show their mettle in a major, but end their career as just another runner-up. Ed Sneed at the Masters, Mike Donald at the U.S. Open, Brain Watts at the British Open, Mike Reid at the PGA.

TODD BENNETT/THE STAR

Tiger Woods celebrates after knocking down his winning birdie putt on the first playoff hole Sunday.

Even multiple close calls in a major doesn't guarantee anything, as Colin Montgomerie and Chip Beck can attest.

DiMarco has proved to be a top-rate golfer. He has played in the Tour Championship the last five years. He won a crucial singles match at the Presidents Cup, and was the only American with a winning record at the Ryder Cup last fall.

"There is no back-off in him," Woods said.

There is no major championship on his resume, either, at least not yet.

DiMarco wants to be known for more than giving the No. 1 player in the world the light of his life on the grandest stage in golf. He is universally respected today. He might be part of a trivia question tomorrow.

Only a major can change that.

Spurrier looks to start fresh

holes created by players kicked off the team.

After a season-ending brawl in a game against Clemson last year, nine players were arrested in the off-season and team members complained that the program had lacked discipline. Spurrier booted several players, including last year's leading rusher, Demetris Summers, from the squad.

"We're all trying to do what's best," Spurrier said. "It's their ultimate responsibility. They chose to do things, and they knew they'd get what they deserved."

Spurrier, who turns 60 next week, said the squad's off-field situation has not altered progress, although he realizes the impact of public perception.

"It's embarrassing, and we don't like it," he said. "We can't let it dampen our spirits. We won't let three or four guys make all of us look bad."

College game suits him, Spurrier could be the best makeup for that black eye.

The coach with the Southern drawl and a reputation for taking verbal jabs at opponents is a welcome figure on the college football landscape. South Carolina is his third stop; he also coached Duke from 1987 to 1989.

Spurrier's start at South Carolina reminds him of his first year at Florida in 1990. The Gators had not experienced a seven-win season in four years before Spurrier arrived. They went 9-2 his first season and finished first in the SEC.

They were not credited with the title, however, because of NCAA violations committed under previous coach Galen Hall. In 1996, the Gators won the national championship; Spurrier was 122-27-1 at Florida.

Spurrier believes South Carolina has every reason to become such an elite program.

South Carolina's program took a significant step up the college football ladder when Holtz took over, reviving a program that in 1998 had gone 1-10.

After enduring an 0-11 season in 1999, Holtz, who is friends with and a golfing buddy of Spurrier, led the Gamecocks to 8-4 and 9-3 seasons and back-to-back wins in the Outback Bowl in 2000-01. That was the school's best two-year stretch in history. But since then, the Gamecocks have been closer to the bottom of the SEC, going 5-7 in 2002 and 2003, and 6-5 last year.

It is up to Spurrier to take his team to the top, something he could not do in the pros.

Spurrier said his experience in the NFL — failing to implement his famous Fun 'n' Gun offense — was not much fun at all. He left two years into a lucrative five-year contract.

"There was not a lot of camaraderie," he said. "But that's not an excuse. It just didn't work out."

Spurrier said he feels not only like a new coach, but also a new man. The college game, in which he can operate more freely with unscripted plays, he said, is what suits him.

"This is the best coaching job in America," he said. "This is the exact place I needed to go to coach."

He spoke passionately about South Carolina's facilities, fans, recruiting ability and administration.

"For some reason, they just didn't achieve much," Spurrier said.

Then what has been missing all those years? Maybe Spurrier, his players say.

"I think so," senior cornerback Tremaine Tyler said. "He's the type of coach you know will put points on the board."

Since Spurrier's arrival, they say, the Gamecocks have a new sense of determination and desire. When Spurrier dismissed players from the team, he delivered a wake-up call.

"That's what every coach needs to do," Tyler said. "The team got more focused. Each player started looking at one another."

Spurrier's Fun 'n' Gun is still looking for a triggerman to help the Gamecocks handle a tough schedule. They play at Georgia, Auburn and Tennessee before facing a much-anticipated meeting against Florida at home on Nov. 12.

Through spring practices, Spurrier, who won the Heisman Trophy for Florida in 1966, has given equal compliments and criticism for his quarterbacks. Redshirt sophomore Blake Mitchell is probably the closest he has to a drop-back passer. Mike Rathe, who is applying for a sixth year of eligibility, redshirt freshman Antonio Heffner, and walk-on Brett Nichols also are competing for the spot.

It's not unusual for Spurrier to rip their performances after practices. But working with Spurrier is still a dream come true, Mitchell said. He pores over a playbook much longer and more complicated than last year's every chance he gets.

"You have to study it a lot or be lost," said Mitchell, who is from Georgia. "Even growing up I liked Florida a lot. You grow up dreaming of playing in that offense."

Controversy surrounds Lowe

By John Nadel
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A day after participating in Boston's World Series celebration, Derek Lowe expressed surprise at the fuss he caused by wearing a Red Sox jersey.

"The jersey was made for that ceremony," Lowe said Tuesday before the Dodgers played their home opener against the San Francisco Giants. "It was just part of it."

His sartorial choice was a subject of debate on sports talk radio and television. Lowe was handed the jersey shortly before the celebration began, and gets to keep it or give it to charity.

Lowe, who won the last game of all three postseason series, flew to Boston to be part of the ceremony honoring the franchise's first World Series champion since 1918, as did outfielder Dave Roberts, a former Dodger who plays for the San Diego Padres but is on the disabled list. Lowe signed a four-year, $36 million contract with Los Angeles during the offseason, and the Dodgers were off Monday.

Lowe said he believes the 34-minute ceremony offered closure for him and the Red Sox.

"Absolutely, 100 percent, and it's good," he said. "The guys on the 2005 team, they don't want to see us around. I'm happy it's over with. The main thing is, no one on our team, they didn't care.

"It was good, a first-class deal," he said of the ceremony. "It wasn't too long. From my standpoint, it was good to see a lot of the guys."

JACK DEMPSEY/BOSTON HERALD-AP

Derek Lowe, who signed with the Dodgers during the winter, came back for Boston's championship ring ceremony on Monday in a Sox jersey.

Manager Jim Tracy and pitchers Odalis Perez and Scott Erickson supported that notion.

"Absolutely not," Tracy said when asked if Lowe's wearing the Red Sox jersey bothered him. "There are people who have played this game a long time who never had an opportunity to experience what he did yesterday."

Perez said much the same thing.

"The way they did it was good," he said. "I believe it was nice for him. It was 86 years, man. Roberts and Lowe — well done. If that happened to me, I would (wear the jersey), too. The goal is to win."

Said Erickson: "Eighty-six years or six years, what's the big deal? That was last year."

Lowe spoke after completing a bullpen session. He was hit just above his right elbow by Craig Counsell's liner in the fifth inning of a 5-4 loss at Arizona on Sunday.

"That was an inch and a half away from complete disaster," Tracy said, expressing the opinion that Lowe's elbow was that close to being broken. "That ball was really smoked. When he fell down at first base is when I took a deep breath when I left the dugout."

Lowe said that while he has a bruise where the ball hit him, he expects to take his regular turn Friday night against the San Diego Padres.

"It's good," he said of his arm. "I look forward to getting back out there — my first game pitching at home."

Schilling ready for Yanks today

BOSTON (AP) — Curt Schilling will have a clean record and a fresh sock when he starts against the New York Yankees on Wednesday night.

His bloody sock made its first appearance the last time the Red Sox played the Yankees, a game that put Boston a win away from the World Series. The stakes won't be as high this time, but the occasion will have special meaning: Schilling's first start of the season .

"It'll be good for him," Boston right fielder Trot Nixon said.

Following Pedro Martinez's decision to sign with the New York Mets, Schilling went to spring training as the undisputed ace of Boston's staff after going 21-6 in his first season. But he was set back by surgery in early November to repair a torn tendon and a cartilage defect in his right ankle.

Early in spring training, he had hoped to start the opener at Yankee Stadium on April 3. But he pitched in just one major league exhibition game and went on the 15-day disabled list retroactive to March 26.

Now he's eager to get started.

"Good," he said Monday when asked how he feels. "Ready to go."

He posted poor numbers in a minor league rehabilitation start but said afterward, "I felt great."

Pitching for Boston's Triple-A Pawtucket team at Indianapolis last Thursday, Schilling allowed seven runs and 11 hits, including two solo homers, in six innings.

"Going into today, I wanted to get mentally ready," he said after the game in which he threw 104 pitches. "No fatigue. I felt strong. I'm going to go out and compete against the Yankees on Wednesday. I'll be ready."

Minutewomen rally to win

big today," Sortino said. "Back-to-back homeruns by a freshman and sophomore — that's pretty amazing."

Extra innings started with both teams not surrendering a run in the eighth inning. Despite UMass getting the bases loaded with one out in the top of the ninth inning, it was unable to take advantage and the game was sent into the 10th after a quiet outing for the Huskies in the ninth.

With the game on the line in the 10th, the Maroon and White were desperate for another offensive burst. A Molinari steal to second base left senior Denise Denis as the deciding factor.

As she has done numerous times throughout her four-year career at UMass, Denis proceeded to hit a sacrifice fly that drove in Molinari and consequently gave UMass the win. The hit was Denis' 24th RBI (team-high) on the season and Molinari is now perfect on the season, successfully stealing 17-of-17 times (A-10 best) over a span of 28 games.

The rookie, Proctor, continues to lead the Minutewomen in batting average with a mark of .359 and has 14 RBI. The record-breaking performance brings Kelley's homerun total to seven on the season, and she leads the team in slugging percentage with a mark of .739.

"I thought we did real well. We continued to fight back," Sortino said. "We could have gone home after the seventh being behind, but we did real well and stuck with it."

ANDREW TAMLETANI/COLLEGIAN

UMass junior hurler Jenna Busa delivers a pitch to the plate. She struck out two Huskies yesterday during the Minutewoman victory.

The close victory over UConn consisted of junior Jenna Busa and senior Barb LaFogg on the mound. Busa struck out two and let up five hits in 4.1 innings, while LaFogg allowed one run and recorded six strikeouts in a total of 5.2 innings.

LaFogg added on to her strikeout count for the season, which now totals 123 in 19 appearances. With a record of 5-1, Busa holds an earned run average of 2.73 on the season. In the four games prior to yesterday, the Minutewoman defense only allowed two runs, shutting out two of those teams.

UMass returns to home today against another Connecticut team, playing the Blue Devils of Central Connecticut that have won three of its last four. This doubleheader, which will take place at the UMass Softball Complex, was originally scheduled for March 29, but was postponed due to rain.

Today's game is the start of a string of home outings for UMass, with six being played between today and Sunday. The Maroon and White are riding a five-game winning streak and are also boasting a streak of 77 unbeaten games at home alive.

UMass ends 12-game slide

The Minutemen came charging out of the gates, scoring four runs on UConn's John Slusarz in the first inning. Slusarz walked Derrick Durepo, who then advanced to second on a wild pitch. Bill Rankin bunted the ball, but it was timed poorly by UConn third baseman Matt Untiet, who threw the ball away, scoring Durepo.

Slusarz proceeded to walk Twomley, who was walked five times in the game, and he advanced to second on a fielder's choice to throw out Curt Szado at first.

Adamski was then hit by a pitch to load the bases, setting up a three-run double by Garrity.

Smith gave up a run in each of the next two innings, and then gave up two in the fourth, when Stone gave him the hook.

"We started with Smith and he did all right getting his feet wet with his first start at Division I," Stone said. "We jumped out of the gates, and it looked like we were going to blow them out, but then we slowed down a little bit in the middle."

The Huskies got good use out of junior right-hander Joe Smeraglino, who pitched 5.1 scoreless innings, while recording five strikeouts and only three hits.

He and MacDonald combined for 7.1 innings, giving up five hits and striking out six.

ANDREW TAMLETANI/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Bill Rankin has hit at a .218 clip so far this season. UMass takes the field again tomorrow against Northeastern.

Notes: UConn assistant coach Chris Podeszwa was ejected from the game after an argument with the home plate umpire in the bottom of the sixth inning. The umpire had to pause the game in the bottom of the eighth when Podeszwa was seen watching from behind the right field fence. Coaches aren't allowed to see or hear the game once they have been ejected from an ECAC game ... Twomley had his 12-game hitting streak broken after getting walked five times.

NHL to resume negotions next week

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — When NHL labor talks resume, a new plan will be up for discussion that attempts to blend elements from both sides' vision of how players will be paid.

Negotiations will probably resume next week, during which a new, hybrid concept — which addresses the relationship between player costs and league revenues — will be brought to the table, a source close to the negotiations told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity Tuesday.

The NHL has maintained that it prefers a link tying player costs to league revenues, while the union has mostly rejected that idea. This new, mixed plan would appear to incorporate elements from both concepts.

Previous compromise discussions have failed to yield signs of progress toward ending the lockout that began seven months ago.

It was thought that talks would resume this week, but as of Tuesday there was still difficulty in scheduling a meeting, the source said. Next week's likely bargaining session would come at a busy time for the NHL, which already has a board of governors meeting planned for Wednesday.

The last bargaining session, held April 4 in Toronto, went better than others since the 2004-05 season was canceled in February. NHL chief legal officer Bill Daly said there was now a good understanding across the table of where the sides are and that he was hopeful there would be continued progress.

Last Thursday, commissioner Gary Bettman and union executive director Bob Goodenow had dinner with some general managers and players in Michigan, where the GMs convened for a meeting. Bettman and Goodenow had a drink together at the hotel bar later that night, and tentatively planned to hold more official talks soon.

On March 17, the NHL made two proposals to the players' association — one containing a link between player costs and league revenues, and another without the relationship.

But the "de-linked" offer had a short shelf life, and the deadline for the union to accept that kind of deal expired last Friday.

It was the second time that type of offer was made to the players' association, and the second time the NHL pulled it off the table. The league first made the overture two days before the season was canceled, and the union responded by dropping its opposition for a salary cap.

The latest unlinked proposal set each team's salary cap at $37.5 million. The linkage offer limited player costs to 54 percent of the league's revenues.

In a related matter, the National Labor Relations Board is still investigating two charges the NHL has made against the players' association.

Pats to play Saints

FOXBORO (AP) — The New England Patriots will play host to the New Orleans Saints in a nationally televised preseason game.

The Pats also travel to Cincinnati for the second year in a row to play the Bengals in an exhibition.

The Super Bowl champions open their 2005 preseason at Cincinnati on Aug. 12.

The Patriots lost to the Bengals 31-3 in the preseason last year, but beat the Bengals during the regular season 33-28.

New England plays host to the Saints on Aug. 18, and is also scheduled to play New Orleans during the regular season.

The Patriots travel to Green Bay for the first time since 1997 on Aug. 25 to play the Packers, then conclude their preseason schedule against the New York Giants on Sept. 1.

It will be the fourth time in the last five years that the Patriots and Giants have played in the preseason.

The regular season schedule will be announced on Wednesday.

Celtics drop 76ers

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Paul Pierce scored 27 points, including the go-ahead basket in the final minute, and the Boston Celtics moved closer toward clinching the Atlantic Division title with a 105-98 victory over second-place Philadelphia on Tuesday night.

Allen Iverson scored 28 points and Kyle Korver added 17 for the 76ers, who fell three games behind Boston with five games remaining.

Philadelphia holds the eighth and final playoff spot in the Eastern Conference, one game behind Cleveland and one game ahead of New Jersey.

Antoine Walker had 18 points and Ricky Davis scored 16 for Boston, which saw a 5 1/2-game lead in the division slip to two games since March 19.

Back in the lineup after missing one game with two sprained thumbs, Iverson was 9-for-21 from the field and had 11 assists.

Chris Webber, returning after missing five games with a sprained left shoulder, wasn't a factor, finishing with eight points and seven rebounds.

Pierce broke a 98-all tie with an 18-footer with just under one minute left. After Marc Jackson missed a short jumper, Gary Payton's free throw gave the Celtics a 101-98 lead.

Jackson missed another jumper and Payton iced it with two free throws with 19 seconds left.

Franczek's heroics end skid

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Freshman third baseman Ryan Franczek heard the metallic "ping!" and watched as his second hit of the game split two UConn infielders. He pumped his right fist and stopped at first base. He knew he had just won the game for his team.

UMass	5
UConn	4

Yesterday at Earl Lorden Field in Amherst, the Massachusetts men's baseball team (4-18 0-6 A-10) defeated the UConn Huskies 5-4, off a single from Franczek with the bases loaded in the bottom of the ninth inning. The win snapped a 12-game losing streak for the Minutemen, dating back to March 16, a 4-2 loss to Bucknell.

UMass returns to action tomorrow when it faces Northeastern at home at 3 p.m.

The ball was literally bouncing the Minutemen's way in the ninth inning when Bryan Adamski nailed a line drive down the third base line. The ball appeared to be an easy grounder, but it ricocheted off the bag and bounced over the head of UConn (20-10) third baseman Pat Mahoney.

"I saw that and thought that maybe there was a light at the end of the tunnel here," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

UMass catcher Bryan Garrity bunted the ball short, but it was misplayed by UConn catcher Steven Malinowski, who threw the ball over the second baseman's head, advancing Adamski to third.

Huskies pitcher Joshua MacDonald, who went two innings with one earned run, intentionally walked Jason Twomley to load the bases. MacDonald was prompted to walk the UMass slugger after he smashed the first pitch of the at bat foul over the right field wall.

UConn coach Jim Penders pulled MacDonald and replaced him with freshman sensation David Erickson. Erickson came into the game with an astounding 0.82 earned run average in 12 appearances with two saves.

Franczek, who only had two hits on the season before yesterday, cracked a curveball between first and second base, knocking home Adamski to win the game.

"My adrenaline was going, and everyone was yelling. I just tried to block it out as best as I could," Franczek said. "I saw the pitch. It was a curveball, and I got it down. I tried to hit the ball hard, or get it to the outfield, then I saw the two kids dive for it and stopped at first base."

UMass pitcher David Sullivan recorded the win for the Minutemen after going a near-flawless 5.2 innings, giving up one hit while recording three strikeouts. Sullivan replaced freshman hurler Aaron Smith in the fourth inning after Smith gave up a game-tying fourth run.

Minutewomen rally for 10th-inning win

In a record-setting afternoon, the Massachusetts softball team (16-11-1 4-2 Atlantic 10) squeaked by the Connecticut Huskies (11-19) in a non-conference duel that lasted a total of 10 innings. The come-from-behind win over the Huskies marks the second contest in a row that the Minutewomen have won in the final inning.

UMass	7
UConn	6

UMass continues its game-filled week today at home as it faces Central Connecticut in a doubleheader beginning at 3 p.m.

"We kept with it, and we've come from behind and held leads," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "The leadership is very good and the freshmen and sophomores are stepping it up big."

The afternoon began in the first inning with junior KJ Kelley breaking the all-time homerun record for UMass by cranking a line drive over the 250-foot fence. This homer gave the Minutewomen the lead, but UConn quickly battled back, when freshman Allie Gendron recorded an RBI double, tying the game at 1 apiece. After two scoreless innings by both teams, the Maroon and White jumped ahead again.

Following a steal by sophomore Candice Molinari, senior Pam Sulick doubled, tacking on two more runs, with Molinari and pinch-running sophomore Michea Holness crossing the plate. Connecticut opened up the floodgates in the fifth inning, however, recording five runs off six hits.

Down 6-3 in the sixth inning, Kelley increased her career home-run tally to 28, with another drive over the center field fence. Following a scoreless outing in the bottom of the sixth inning for the Huskies, UMass had one inning to comeback.

The fate of the game was left on the shoulders of two underclassmen, freshman Lauren Proctor and sophomore Amanda Morin. The duo gave the Minutewomen exactly what they needed, hitting back-to-back homeruns, and tying up the ballgame. The four homeruns on the day tie a UMass record that was set on March 27 against La Salle.

Northeastern hires Cronin

The Northeastern men's hockey team hired Greg Cronin to be its next head coach, NU Athletic Director Dave O'Brien announced yesterday, ending the search for Bruce Crowder's replacement that lasted just under a month.

The Huskies chose not to renew the contract of Crowder on March 16. Crowder went 15-18-5 in his ninth season at the helm, leading Northeastern to an over-achieving sixth-place finish in Hockey East before being swept by New Hampshire in the first round of the conference playoffs.

"We wanted a coach who is passionate about hockey, understands what it takes to win and expects to win," O'Brien said on Northeastern's athletics' Web site yesterday.

"Under Greg Cronin's leadership, we are looking forward to an exciting and ambitious new era for Northeastern's men's ice hockey program."

Cronin will finish coaching the Islanders' AHL affiliate Bridgeport Sound Tigers, who will play three more games before the season wraps up on Sunday. The Sound Tigers are 35-37-4-1 this year.

Last year, his first as the Bridgeport coach, he led the team to a franchise-record 98-point season and 41-23-12-4 record and was also named the coach of the PlanetUSA team in the AHL All-Star game.

Cronin has been with the Islanders since 1998 and has held several different coaching positions, including assistant coach of the NHL squad for five seasons.

Cronin also served as an assistant coach for five seasons under Sean Walsh at Maine in the 1980s. In 1995-96, he led the Black Bears to a 27-12-2 record as interim coach and also brought the team to the Hockey East finals.

He played for Colby College from 1982-86.

A Boston native, Cronin's father, Don Cronin, was the Northeastern team captain in 1958-59, and his uncle, Gerry Cronin was the NU team captain in 1960-61.

Closers facing tough opening

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

Mariano Rivera blows two saves against Boston, Keith Foulke gives up a game-ending homer to Derek Jeter.

Cleveland's Bob Wickman wastes a ninth-inning lead against the White Sox, and the very next day Chicago closer Shingo Takatsu gives up three homers in the ninth against the Indians.

"Those guys are not going to save every game they pitch," said Colorado manager Clint Hurdle, whose bullpen failed to hold a pair of leads against San Francisco last weekend. "And once there's one chink in your armor, it affects your confidence."

While position players and starting pitchers get into game shape during spring training, closers can't really get parallel experience. For them, it's not the innings or pitch count that matter: Their specialty is being able to pitch with no margin for error, needing to get only three outs most of the time.

"There's really no way that you can simulate the regular season in spring training," Houston closer Brad Lidge said. "Right now, maybe the ball isn't bouncing the right way for Rivera and some of those guys, but over the course of the season it evens itself out. My guess is by the middle of the season, people won't even remember."

There were 39 blown saves in 99 games through Monday, according to the Elias Sports Bureau, up from 35 in the first 102 games of last year.

Rivera, who converted 53 of 57 save chances last year, has blown four straight against the Red Sox, including two in last October's AL championship series. Twelve of his 28 blown saves since the start of the 2001 season have been against Boston, and some fans at Yankee Stadium booed him last week after his second failure in a row.

"It's always good or bad," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "If you're a closer, either you do it or you don't do it. You're successful, or you're a failure."

Texas closer Francisco Cordero has blown two of four save chances, giving up a homer to Anaheim's Darin Erstad on an 0-2 pitch in the ninth inning of the Rangers' loss Monday. Cordero converted 49 of 54 chances last year and allowed just one homer.

Mets closer Braden Looper had 29 saves in 34 chances last year, but right now he has to shed memories from his first appearance this year, when he gave up home runs to Adam Dunn and Joe Randa in a 7-6 loss at Cincinnati.

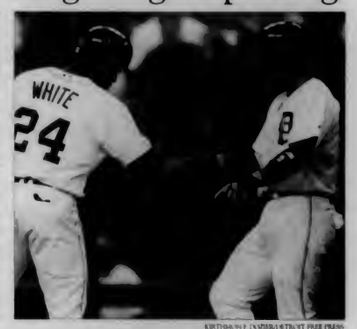
Looper's performance cost Pedro Martinez a win in his Mets' debut and started New York on a season-opening 0-5 slide.

"I've definitely given up my share of whatever you want to call it," Looper said. "But on opening day, it stinks."

Wickman had converted 12 straight chances dating to last season heading into last Wednesday's game at Chicago.

He entered with a 3-0 lead but gave up hits to four straight batters in a span of eight pitches, including consecutive homers by Paul Konerko and Jermaine Dye, and the White Sox won 4-3.

Takatsu had a 5-2 lead in the ninth the next day but gave up home runs to Casey Blake, Coco Crisp and Ronnie Belliard, and the Indians won in 11 innings.



On Sunday at Detroit, Wickman gave up an RBI single to Carlos Guillen before retiring Ivan Rodriguez on a grounder to preserve Cleveland's 7-6 win.

Wickman admitted Wednesday's meltdown remained on his mind.

"I'm thinking, 'Here we go again,' just like everyone else," he said.

Colorado set a major league record with 34 blown saves last year, when the Rockies bullpen totaled just 36 saves. Hurdle tries to get his closers back on the mound as soon as possible after a bad games.

"It happens. They're humans," he said. "You don't have a pause button with a closer without controversy. You try to find better matchups or matchups that are more conducive to his strengths."

DiMarco feeling the spotlight

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

Chris DiMarco had a satellite truck parked outside his house and a long list of television and radio interviews to do, the kind of treatment usually afforded a Masters champion.

DiMarco was only the runner-up.

The guy with the green jacket, Tiger Woods, was on the other side of town in Orlando, Fla., meeting VIPs from Accenture, one of his sponsors, for a Monday outing planned long before he won his fourth Masters.

Rarely does second place draw so much attention.

"I went out and shot 68 around here on Sunday, which is a very good round. And 12 under is usually good enough to win," DiMarco said after his playoff loss. "I just was playing against Tiger Woods."

That's what made this runner-up finish so compelling. That's why the loudest cheers were for DiMarco along the back nine at Augusta National, and even during the closing ceremony, when Woods paid tribute to "one heck of a competitor out there."

It was almost an afterthought during the final round that DiMarco had been here before — not just in the final group at the Masters, but in a playoff at a major. Seven months ago at Whistling Straits, he missed an 18-foot birdie putt on the final hole of the PGA Championship, then lost in a three-way playoff to Vijay Singh.

But that was different.

Justin Leonard should have won the PGA except for a balky putter. DiMarco slipped into contention with a 1-under 71, the only player among the final 11 groups who broke par on a vicious course. The memory of DiMarco from Whistling Straits is that he had a birdie putt on the 18th hole and left it short.

He was the model of grit and determination at the Masters.

DiMarco shot 41 on the back nine Sunday morning to finish his third round, turning a four-shot lead into a three-shot deficit to a player who had never lost the lead in the final round of a major.

No one gave him a chance.

It was a two-man race from the start, and DiMarco never backed down. Despite giving up 80 yards at times off the tee, DiMarco was inside Woods for birdie on all but five holes. He was aggressive, fearless. He tried to make birdies on his last two holes and left himself 6 feet for par, then made both those to force a playoff.

This was quite a change from last year at Augusta National, when he was tied for the lead with Phil Mickelson going into the last round and shot 76 to quickly take himself out of contention.

"I don't think I was ready to win," DiMarco said. "This year, I was ready to win. I really felt like I could win it. And coming out the way I did, I will be ready to win next year."

Next year?

What about the next major?

There already is some thought that DiMarco should move to the top of the list as the "best player to have never won a major," but only because his final round is still fresh.

DiMarco has only won three times in his 10 years on the PGA Tour, none against particularly strong fields. There's a

Spurrier looking for new start

By Shannon Ryan
Knight Ridder

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Visor snug, shades on, and the sun beaming over a Southern college football field. Is there any other way — or place — to picture Steve Spurrier?

The new University of South Carolina coach, a love-him-or-hate-him figure at Florida for 12 years, is back in familiar territory in the Southeastern Conference. After a disastrous two-year stint in the NFL, where he was 12-20 as head coach of the Washington Redskins, Spurrier said he feels rejuvenated roaming a college sideline again.

"It's a new life here," Spurrier said after a scrimmage last week.

Associating Spurrier with the Gamecocks rather than the Gators and obliterating the memory of those dreadful years in Washington will take some time. Nothing a banner season can't fix.

And seasons like those are hardly common for the Gamecocks.

Spurrier's return to the college ranks has not exactly been a breeze, either, since he was hired in November to take over for retiring Lou Holtz.

Despite all those years thumping South Carolina while coaching at Florida, Spurrier is a popular man here. Last week, 1,000 fans showed up for a midweek scrimmage. The weekend before about 2,500 arrived.

In addition to bolstering his own reputation, Spurrier wants to make South Carolina — typically an SEC nonfactor — a title contender. That means transforming a run-oriented team into one of his hot, signature, slinging Fun 'n' Gun units and finding ways to plug

PVTA proposing cuts on summer bus routes

By Matt Pilon
Collegian Correspondent

To account for increased costs of fuel and employee health benefits, the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority is again proposing an elimination of certain routes for next year.

Fuel and health benefits make up 27 percent of the entire budget, according to Director of Procurement and Transit Planning, Sandra Sheehan. The increased costs will mean an expected $800,000 budget gap, the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported Sunday.

The state will fund 43 percent of next year's PVTA budget. The rest must be acquired through federal and local means. The increased operating costs are not reflected in the state's budget, according to PVTA officials, which has been at a relative standstill.

Before any final decisions are made, the PVTA plans to hear public comments on the proposals. There is a public hearing today at noon at Springfield City Hall in room 220. The PVTA is also accepting written comments.

Among the proposed cutbacks are mostly weekend and summer routes.

"We're keeping what we consider a core-service model," Sheehan said.

This is so that people can still get to and from work during the week, she said.

The Florence Heights Sunday route, the Saturday Northampton to Williamsburg route, and the summertime Sunday Nort-hampton/UMass route are being considered for elimination during the school year. The Saturday Palmer shuttle has also been proposed to be cut.

The PVTA is also proposing to eliminate summer time Sunday routes to South Deerfield, Sunderland, and Belchertown from the Amherst area. Seven Sunday Springfield routes are also being considered as well as a reduction in Northampton to Holyoke services.

While the majority of the workforce will still be able to get to and from work, it is the weekend riders who will feel the greatest effects. Most weekend riders are senior citizens who need the bus to get to the grocery store or pharmacy or area residents who work weekends.

Northampton resident Ronald Carter, 76, says he rides the bus to CVS to pick up prescriptions on the weekend because he does not own a car. If the blue 43 route is cut on Sundays in the summer it will be an inconvenience, he said.

"I still need my medication during the summer, and if this bus stops running on Sundays, that means I have to go on Saturday. It's not the end of the world but it makes it harder," he said.

RIAA may not pursue UMass lawsuits

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Although the Recording Industry Association of America filed lawsuits against 25 students at the University of Massachusetts for illegally downloading MP3 songs, the president of company said yesterday he doesn't think the RIAA will follow up on various lawsuits.

Along with UMass, the RIAA is suing students from 17 other campuses across the country, but the president said that the problem is a lot more widespread.

Cary Sherman, the president of the RIAA, said in an internet chat with collegiate reporters that he has notified the 140 universities about the problem on their campuses.

"Chances are we will not take further action against these particular infringements, but we're reserving the right to do so. In any event, we will certainly take action against future infringements," he said.

Students across the country are continuing to use the "Internet2" network to transfer files, both legally and illegally. However, the files that are now mainly traded on "i2hub" are MP3 files, which are copyrighted songs.

Sherman said that his company is not releasing the names of schools or students who were named in the lawsuits.

The network, created by former UMass student Wayne Chang, was not the target of Sherman's anger.

"We have no problem with Internet2. It is a neutral network that is capable of outstanding beneficial uses. It just happens to be being misused by some file-sharers who think it's a convenient way to steal music," Sherman said in the chat.

According to UMass Director of News and Information Ed Blaguszewski, the RIAA contacts the University almost every month to let them know about users on the server that create a lot of traffic on the network.

"It's a complex process here," Blaguszewski said. "[Downloading music on i2hub] is against University policy. It's against the law."

Blaguszewski said that when all students enter the University, they sign papers saying that they will not illegally download songs on the server. If they do, they face sanctions by the Student Code of Conduct.

SGA plan addresses issues of diversity

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Several members of the Student Government Association, including members of the executive cabinet and the Student Center for Education Research Advocacy, drafted a Community Action Plan that they introduced during last night's Senate meeting.

The committee that drafted the plan in response to Chancellor John V. Lombardi's diversity recommendations has followed the lead of former President of the SGA Eduardo Bustamante. Bustamante, who vehemently opposed various elements of Lombardi's plan, took the initiative to create a response to the recommendations. The committee members felt that it is necessary to complete a revised plan.

Executive cabinet member, Barak Sared, a member of the committee, criticized certain members of the committee claiming that their interests in diversity are somewhat null because of their history in the SGA.

"This is supposed to reflect senate leadership," Sared said, "two of [the members] are former KKK-9 members and one of them is Pat Higgins' roommate."

Sared said that although he thinks that the drafted plan is important, he added that it is equally important for the senate to rethink the members commitment to diversity.

"Their past issues with diversity [on this campus] should be considered," he said.

Speaker of the SGA Mark Morrison, who was also a committee member, praised the aforementioned senators involvement in the committee.

"Everyone was invited [to the committee]," Morrison said, "attacking people for their past mistakes is tactless."

Morrison said that the members of the infamous KKK-9 "have learned their mistakes." Last March members of the SGA and other campus groups were photographed drinking alcoholic beverages in a University office and mocking a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard. The controversial photos led to many members resigning from the SGA.

"People need to grow up," Morrison said, "this is just ridiculous, and as far as Senate leadership, they are the people who want to be here."

The report, which was introduced to the Senate last night, is a detailed description about points that the SGA agrees with

Professor says Democrats are acting like Republicans

By Hayden Marx
Collegian Staff

Democrats have lost seven out of the last ten presidential elections, and according to Gerald Friedman, professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts, there may be a "connection between democrats losing and democrats acting like republicans."

Friedman says the Democratic Party has undergone many changes over the last decade that are not necessarily for the better.

"Now look at it today. We've lost seven out of the last ten elections and republicans control both houses," Friedman said during his discussion "How to Stop Losing" on Tuesday.

He said the reason the Democrats are losing elections is because they have become too much like the Republicans in their economic views. Bad economic analysis has prevented the Democrats from campaigning and governing effectively.

Traditionally, democrats supported large government and wanted to protect individual rights through public regulation. Today, Friedman says democrats have begun to follow the Republican model of thinking — that the best way to guarantee the economic success of the country is to promote it at the individual level.

In this way, the Democrats have become like socially liberal republicans. "Given the choice of a socially liberal republican and a hardcore republican, people will gloss over the economic issues and vote on the social ones," said Friedman.

"We need a clear agenda," he added. "People think they know what republicans stand for. They don't know what democrats stand for."

For instance, Kerry lost the white working class workers vote by 23 percent. "They voted republican because they saw no reason to vote democrat," said Friedman.

Student granted DC semester study; meets Kerry and Clinton

University of Massachusetts sophomore Erinn Larkin, a political science major, is among nine students nationwide accepted to the Semester in Washington Program at The George Washington University.

While spending the spring semester in Washington D.C., Larkin has been busy meeting some of the country's top politicians, taking courses, and working at an internship at the National Committee for an Effective Congress.

Larkin is taking Political Management and Campaigns and Elections courses at George Washington. Campaigns and Elections is a practicum devoted to the 2006 New Mexico senate race.

"The students develop a campaign plan for their candidate, including consideration of all the factors that a real campaign must consider," said program Director Gregory Lebel. "They also conceive, tape, edit, and finalize a thirty- second television ad for their candidate."

At the National Committee for an Effective Congress, Larkin works four days a week.

"Basically I work with databases entering data from the 2004 election — incident reports, unfairness of some precincts towards democratic voters," said Larkin.

She describes Washington D.C. with great fondness.

"I'm a city person so I like it a lot better than UMass. It's fascinating. It's just so fast-paced that it's literally difficult to keep up with what's happening in the city."

Tufts frat closed for hazing

MEDFORD, Mass. (AP) — Tufts University has closed a fraternity for one year following a hazing incident in which an intoxicated student lost consciousness and stopped breathing, a school spokeswoman said Tuesday.

The Tufts chapter of Delta Tau Delta already was on probation for alcohol-related violations when the unidentified student was hospitalized Feb. 26 for excessive drinking, according to Tufts spokeswoman Kim Thurler.

Fraternity members called the campus police after the student lost consciousness and stopped breathing. He was revived and has since made a full recovery, according to Thurler.

The student's excessive drinking was "something the fraternity was encouraging" as part of an apparent hazing ritual, Thurler said.

"It was associated with a pledge event," she added. "We regard that kind of activity to be a serious hazing incident."

Chapter president Noah Ornstein denied that the student, a freshman, was pressured to drink.

"There was no forced consumption on any level," he said. "The amount of alcohol consumed was determined by each student individually."

Last Friday, the school's Judiciary Committee on Fraternities and Sororities — a panel of administrators and students — voted unanimously to close the fraternity for one year, effective May 22, the date of Tufts's Commencement ceremony.

Rudolph pleads guilty to bombing

ATLANTA (AP) — A defiant Eric Rudolph pleaded guilty Wednesday to carrying out the deadly bombing at the 1996 Atlanta Olympics and three other attacks, saying he picked the Summer Games to embarrass the U.S. government in front of the world "for its abominable sanctioning of abortion on demand."

"Because I believe that abortion is murder, I also believe that force is justified ... in an attempt to stop it," he said in a statement handed out by his lawyers after he entered his pleas in back-to-back court appearances, first in Birmingham, Ala., in the morning, then in Atlanta in the afternoon.

Rudolph, 38, worked out a plea bargain that will spare him from the death penalty. He will get four consecutive life sentences without parole for the four blasts across the South that killed two people and wounded more than 120 others.

Rudolph expressed remorse in his statement only for the Olympic bombing, saying "I do apologize to the victims and their families." In all the attacks, he said he intended only to target "agents of the Washington government" or "abortionists."

Befuddled beluga found in river

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — Curious boaters were hampering a wayward whale's return to the ocean Wednesday as the animal meandered up and down the Delaware River about 70 miles from open water, officials said.

The 12- to 15-foot white beluga whale was spotted Wednesday near the Burlington-Bristol Bridge, about eight miles south of where it was first spotted a day earlier, said Sheila Dean, of the Marine Mammal Stranding Center.

The whale had made its way upriver from Delaware Bay past Philadelphia and Camden to spend much of Tuesday swimming in a loop near Trenton. Its presence drew crowds of onlookers to the banks of the river while television news helicopters hovered overhead.

Authorities hope the whale will find its way south to open water. Dean said boaters trying to approach the whale have hindered that progress, creating a "harassment problem."

It is a violation of federal law to try to feed, capture, hunt or harass marine mammals. No arrests had been made.

"Our enemy here is too much attention," said state police Sgt. Stephen Jones. "We want the whale to get his bearings and continue south without interference from too many curious onlookers."

Center director Bob Schoelkopf said the whale may be a juvenile unable to fend for itself in the open ocean, or an adult that chased a school of herring up the river.

Dems turning worse

Friedman believes that the best way to fight this is for the Democrats to return to their roots. These roots are located in the New Deal Democrats from 1947 to 1973. The New Deal Democrats believed that the goal of state policy should be to enhance the opportunities for everyone. Under this agenda, policy benefits would be given out according to need.

Friedman said the least fortunate people should get the most help because they are receiving the smallest benefit from living in our society. By returning to these roots, the Democrats would give reasons for the working class voter to vote for them — a necessity if they hope to win any future elections.

Friedman has been involved with the Democratic Party for most of his career. He first worked on a political campaign in 1970. He is the author of "State-Making and Labor Movements: France and the United States", as well as many other articles on the history of organized labor in the United States and Europe.

she has met is impressive: John Kerry.

John Edwards, Al Sharpton, Howard Dean, Barack Obama, and Bill Clinton. Her favorite politician who she recently met is House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who Larkin describes as a wonderful speaker and a successful woman in a male-dominated field.

Larkin said one of the best parts of the experience for her has been the diversity of opinions she has encountered.

"I think just having the Washington perspective on politics is extremely important. It's important to broaden your perspective. UMass is very liberal and you really get only one side.

My roommate here is an evangelical Christian, which is kinda like a dirty word at UMass, so that in itself has been an experience."

Larkin has a 3.9 GPA but her acceptance to the program was based more on campaign experience than grades. Since 2001, Larkin has worked for Jim Langevin, a congressman from Rhode Island, doing survey research and fundraising. Jobs like that one helped her get accepted to the Semester in Washington program.

Langevin was among the people who recommended Larkin for the Washington program. When it comes to her work, Larkin believes in going the extra mile.

For instance, when the George Washington program gave applicants the choice of writing one of two optional essays, Larkin wrote both.

When Larkin found out she was accepted, she was in her dorm room in Crabtree in Northeast.

"I was a little bit shocked and totally surprised and happy. Washington is my mecca so I was thrilled to be going there and living right down the street from the White House."

Larkin isn't sure what she wants to do when she finishes school. She says many students in the program come back to Washington to work in Congress, the media, at an advocacy group, or professional organizations after graduating.

"[Success is] setting a goal and accomplishing it. That's what is comes down to. Tiny goals," she said.

SGA newsletter proposed and parts that it doesn't. For example, the committee members did admit that they "agreed with the spirit" of the commission's mission statement, however they "unanimously rejected" the clause that stated that the University will have control of the SGA's budget allocation.

The complete detailed draft plan can be seen on the Student Government Web site.

In other orders of business, the Public Policy Relations committee met this weekend and drafted a plan to create a SGA newsletter. According to Chair of the PPR committee, Tristan Brown, the newsletter will be a monthly insert into the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. He enthusiastically said that this newsletter can create "legitimacy of the SGA." He also said that students could become more aware of events and issues that the SGA is dealing with.

"It would create an informed student body so that students are always up to date with what we do," Brown said. "This is a great tool in helping the SGA gain legitimacy."

MEGAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

SGA President Pavel Payano and other SGA members discussed the Community Action Plan unveiled at last night's meetings.

"Brown also said that the monthly newsletters could coincide with the 'Back to the People Meetings' and students could meet with senators in the dining commons during the meetings as well as have something to read.

Also, the Senate voted to allocate $2,985 to the Sylvan Area Government for the "Sylvan Extravaganza" slated to take place May 7.

According to Sylvan Area Governor Alan Chow, the money is essential for the extravaganza to take place.

"We are going to have five bands and mission improvable will be hosting," Chow said, "There will also be a dunk tank, laser tag and food."

"When you become a student, you sign a condition of terms," Blaguszewski said. He added that after the RIAA e-mails the University the student's IP information, the University discontinues the student's OIT access, and the students must go talk to the Help Desk before their internet is reinstated.

According to Blaguszewski, once the students are contacted, they often cease their the illegal activity. He did say, however, that sometimes students don't know how to properly rid their system of the software, and that causes troubles. He said that the University receives about 50 IP addresses a month.

"We make it very clear to the students that they risk a permanent loss from the system. The students then get it that they're doing something illegal," Blaguszewski said.

If students continue illegal activity on the network, Blaguszewski said, they face discipline by the Dean, according to the Student Code of Conduct. Punishment can range from a conversation to a suspension.

Blaguszewski also said that he doesn't know if any of the students in the lawsuits have already been contacted by OIT about their use of the system.

Even though this is a problem, Blaguszewski said that the University knows that it can't confront every student who violates a copyright law by downloading a song.

"We don't get into the business of scrutinizing every traffic on the network," he said. "We take action when we are alerted by the RIAA."

According to Sherman, the average user has about 2300 MP3 files, and about 2,900 files, on their computer. The user with the most had about 13,000.

While Blaguszewski and Sherman both understand that file sharing s probably here to stay, they need to educate people about how it is illegal and can negatively impact anyone.

"These lawsuits are getting a lot of publicity, which means that the message will get out far and wide," Sherman said in the chat. Sherman said that 44 schools have currently worked out deals so that students at their university can legally trade music.

Blaguszewski said that he too feels that the students should be educated as to what is legal, and what is not.

"The students need to take responsibility for their actions," he said. "The University network is being misused."

Sherman said that the minimum penalty is $750 per work infringed. He said that they usually settle for far less — about $4000 per case.

"Suffice it to say that this is not a profit-making venture," he said.

He said that it is estimated that the music industry loses anywhere from $700 million to several billion dollars from illegal activity.

Flu samples limited by officials

By KEVIN FREKING
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Even as they sought to reassure a wary public, federal health officials detailed plans Wednesday to restrict the number of labs that can handle deadly flu viruses like the ones sent to thousands of facilities worldwide.

"We are working on the side of caution," said Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Labs around the world tracked and destroyed samples of the deadly flu strain, which has been included in a kit designed to test a lab's ability to identify viruses. The CDC was trying to determine why the deadly H2N2 flu virus was included in the first place.

"We are very concerned that this particular strain of virus was used for proficiency testing," Gerberding said.

Gerberding repeatedly described the risk of somebody contracting the virus as minimal. "If an unusual virus had emerged, we would have known it by now," she said.

Still, she said, the agency was intent on ensuring that every sample shipped to more than 4,000 labs in 18 countries or territories had been destroyed. So far, about 1,000 labs have sent statements to the College of American Pathologists confirming the samples they received were destroyed.

The World Health Organization's influenza chief, Klaus Stohr, said he was "relatively confident" most of the samples outside the United States would be destroyed by Friday.

Canada, South Korea, Hong Kong and Singapore have destroyed their samples, while Japan was doing the same, WHO said. Taiwan and Germany announced that they had destroyed all their vials.

The germ, the 1957 H2N2 "Asian flu" strain, killed between 1 million and 4 million people. It has not been included in flu vaccines since 1968; anyone born after that date has little or no immunity to it.

The samples were sent, beginning in September, as part of a testing process that measures a laboratory's proficiency in detecting various strains of influenza. The College of American Pathologists directs the testing and contracted with Meridian Bioscience, a company based in Cincinnati, to distribute the test kits.

A Canadian lab alerted WHO last month that the kit included the 1957 strain.

Gerberding said it was not clear why such a dangerous strain of influenza was included in the test kits.

"It's impossible to believe they did not know they were dealing with H2N2," Gerberding said.

Progressives talk of ordination of women

By Rachel Zoll
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Despite a 26-year papacy that shut down talk of changing the all-male priesthood, progressive Catholics are convinced that the ongoing clergy shortage and rising number of female lay leaders in American churches will eventually create pressure for the Vatican to ordain women.

Until then, many women activists hope to build their influence with appointments to higher-ranking positions in dioceses, Catholic universities and even the Vatican.

"I basically think the next generation will see the ordination of women," said Lisa Sowle Cahill, a theologian at Boston College and past president of the Catholic Theological Society of America. "That change will not emanate from the top, but from the grass roots or local churches which the Vatican will then recognize."

Catholics who support this view say they are speaking mainly about trends in North American and European churches. In the United States, at the end of Pope John Paul II's pontificate, more lay people than clergy were working full-time in American parishes and many of those lay leaders were women. They served, for example, as Eucharistic ministers, who distribute Holy Communion in places where there is no priest. In Europe, the push for women's ordination is supported by the Catholic reform group We Are Church and others.

Advocates are aware that women in parts of the world where Catholicism is growing fastest — Africa and Latin America — have dramatically different concerns and may not think about becoming priests. Poverty, domestic violence, education and health are more pressing issues for Third World Catholic women, many of whom adhere to a very conservative view of faith and embrace traditional roles for men and women.

Also, no one expects the next pope to change course from John Paul, who unequivocally backed a men-only priesthood.

However, in churches in the United States, many progressives believe numbers and time are on their side. Most religion instructors are women, and more women are becoming diocesan chancellors, canon lawyers and theologians. The two top lay people that U.S. bishops appointed to help them respond to the clergy sex abuse crisis were women: Illinois Justice Anne Burke led the National Review Board, a watchdog panel the bishops set up, and Kathleen McChesney, a former FBI agent, was the first director of the bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection.

No suit will be brought for Wendy's finger chili

LAS VEGAS (AP) — A woman who claimed she scooped up a human linger in her chili at a Wendy's restaurant has decided not to sue the fast-food chain, her lawyer said Wednesday.

Anna Ayala is dropping her claim because the police investigations, DNA tests, a search of her home and intense publicity have "been very difficult for her emotionally," Attorney Jeffrey Janoff said.

He would not say if the decision was prompted by a report a woman in Nevada had lost her finger a month earlier in a leopard attack, and that it might be related to Ayala's claim.

Police in San Jose, Calif., said they were investigating a possible connection to Sandy Allman, the owner of several exotic animals who lost her digit in a leopard attack Feb. 23 in Pahrump, 60 miles west of Las Vegas.

"We're talking to the woman who lost the finger," San Jose police spokeswoman Gina Tepoorten said.

Allman's lawyer, Philip Sheldon, said his client had "absolutely no connection with Ms. Ayala."

He said Allman, 59, last saw the tip of her middle finger packed with ice on a hospital emergency room table. She left after doctors told her it couldn't be reattached.

Tepoorten added authorities have gotten tips from around the country about lost digits — including one woman who claimed she lost a finger while breaking up a dog fight "and apparently the hospital lost her finger."

Ayala was visiting relatives in San Jose on Wednesday and could not be reached for comment, said her son, Guadalupe Reyes, 18.

The teenager said Ayala doesn't known Allman. "Mom doesn't even know how to get to Pahrump," Reyes said, adding that his mother was distressed by all the attention.

"The way I see it, it's like a big show," Reyes said. "Everyone's saying this and that. It's ridiculous. People are just trying to get the $50,000" reward offered by Wendy's.

Efforts to contact Allman were unsuccessful.

Tepoorten said Ayala was not considered a suspect. "She's not our main focus in the investigation," Tepoorten said, without elaborating.

Ayala, 39, was at a Wendy's restaurant in San Jose on March 22 when she claimed she scooped up the 1 1/2-inch-long fingertip. She later filed a claim with the franchise owner, Fresno-based JEM Management Corp., which her attorney had said was the first step before filing a lawsuit.

Court records show Ayala has a history of making claims against corporations, including a former employer, General Motors and a fast-food restaurant. She acknowledged getting a settlement several years ago after her daughter was sickened at a Las Vegas restaurant.

"Lies, lies, lies, that's all I am hearing," she said last week after her home was searched last week by police. "They should look at Wendy's. What are they hiding? Why are we being victimized again and again?"

Clark County District Attorney David Roger said Wednesday documents relating to the warrant had been sealed.

Wendy's spokesman Denny Lynch declined to comment on Ayala's decision to drop the lawsuit, but said a reward hot line will stay open. "It's very important to us to find out what really happened at the restaurant," he said.

Wendy's maintains the finger did not enter the chili in its ingredients. All the employees at the San Jose store were found to have all their fingers, and no suppliers of Wendy's ingredients have reported any hand or finger injuries, the company said. Officials also still had not confirmed whether the finger was cooked, as initial news reports indicated.

The Santa Clara County Coroner's Office was using a partial fingerprint to try to find a match in an electronic database but came up empty. DNA testing is still being conducted on the finger.

Lawmakers hear testimony to increase EC

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — When the 12-year-old rape victim and her mother arrived at the hospital, doctors began caring for the traumatized girl. But they didn't mention or offer emergency contraception that could have prevented the girl from becoming pregnant.

Three months later, the girl and her mother were horrified to learn the girl was pregnant — a story that occurs too often in Massachusetts, according to Dr. Karen Lifford, who recounted the story to lawmakers hearing testimony Wednesday on bills that would increase access to the so-called "morning-after" contraception.

"It's not an uncommon story," Lifford, medical director of Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts, said of the girl outside the hearing room. "This is a specific example of a scenario that we see repeated in different forms on a weekly basis."

Courtesy Advocates

Yesterday, supporters urged lawmakers to increase access to emergency contraception.

For two years, lawmakers and supporters have been pushing legislation to increase access to emergency contraception. Last year, the Senate approved legislation, but it stalled in the House and never came to a vote.

Lawmakers say chances for approval of the legislation have improved, and on Wednesday, the Committee on Public Health took up the issue as supporters and opponents came to testify about the medication. Six other states have enacted similar legislation.

The medication is a hormone in pill form which is most effective taken within 72 hours of intercourse. Emergency contraception stops pregnancy by preventing ovulation, stopping the egg from being fertilized by sperm, or stopping a fertilized egg from attaching itself to the uterus wall. It is different from RU-486, which aborts a fertilized egg.

The legislation would require hospital emergency rooms to provide information about the contraception and offer the medication itself to rape victims. The legislation would also allow women to get the pills from pharmacists without a doctor's prescription. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has not approved its sale for over-the-counter purchase.

Supporters also say emergency contraception would reduce the number of abortions by 50 percent, because unwanted pregnancies could be stopped before a fetus develops.

Understanding campus activism

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

In recent weeks, the University of Massachusetts has witnessed an encouraging outpour of student energy and RSO mobilization in the name of our right to a participatory education and to conduct our own affairs in peace. I applaud those individuals that have stepped up and continue to selflessly devote their time and energy to defending our university for all of us. I remind those that have remained removed from these affairs that it is never too late to learn about the issues and become involved, and I encourage you to do so. Join the GEO walkout/student boycott on Thursday, April 21 (it's a Monday schedule due to the holiday) by boycotting your classes and/or heading out to the Student Union to educate yourself and get in on this exciting and noble action.

Some students have complained that GEO and Take Back UMass rallies are self-contradictory since they undermine the very educational process that they purport to defend. Why don't these groups direct their attention toward Whitmore, and why don't they seek their success through the standard channels provided them by university protocol?

Now is a time for students to become informed and come together as a powerful, unified body in our demand to create the university that we desire and are capable of having.

Aside from this position's disregard for the future of the university, it also defeats its own critique by misinterpreting the source of the classroom disruption and by proposing that GEO and Take Back UMass do either what they have already done or pursue channels that the administration has already eliminated as viable options. More unfortunate than this gross muddling of the facts is the potential discontinuity it creates in a student body that, at least for the moment, shares an explicit and common interest that requires an uphill fight.

In truth, the most drastic restructuring of the university in 30 years is going down almost entirely behind closed doors. The radical restructuring of 30 years ago was a pro-student movement brought about by students' own activism and resulted in most of the privileges we enjoy and take for granted today: active RSOs, independent student business and media, etc. Now, in what is becoming an increasingly unabashed anti-student regime, the Lambardi/Gargano junta seeks to capitalize upon the general sentiment of apathy on campus by rolling back these hard-won student prerogatives and expanding administrative control over all areas of student life and academics.

At the same time, the university is in blatant violation of its obligations to graduate employees who continue to work without the new contract promised them, and have now been told that the administration refuses even to honor the terms of the old contracts. Working for years now without proper reimbursement, it is only out of the sheer goodwill and dedication to education of the GEO that UMass has been able to keep on functioning. Now being told by the administration that they must accept pay cuts even as healthcare, childcare, and housing costs increase, these already under compensated professionals are simply incapable of conducting "business as usual."

And what of the tactics employed by the GEO and Take Back UMass to voice their defense of student liberties and graduate employee rights? Truth be told, both groups have been exceedingly well behaved. In fact, their respect for university rules and quotidian affairs may spell their eventual demise since it permits the Lombardi Administration to ignore the urgency of their claims and execute unimpeded its anti-student objectives. Attempts to engage in constructive student-administration dialogue have failed, though not for want of student initiative or involvement, and our voices have been met with what might most aptly be described as ruthless administrative disrespect. As it is, marches have been aimed at Whitmore while buildings that are academic in nature have remained untouched — though this leaves unacknowledged the reality that we should not and may not continue our learning and teaching under current conditions.

In short, now is a time for students to become informed and come together as a powerful, unified body in our demand to create the university that we desire and are capable of having. This is our university, funded by our taxes and our tuition payments, and we have the authority to defend it from the invasive and authoritarian administration that seeks to convince us otherwise. Go home, think it over, and get involved.

'R' is for 'Rule-breakers'

Thomas Naughton

Well kids, the letter of today is 'R,' like the 'r' in Thursday. The letter 'R' is also seen in other places, like the (R) after an elected official's name which stands for the political party they represent. What political party does "(R)" stand for? "Republicans" at least, but more accurately, "Rule-breakers."

Republicans love to break the rules. They may follow those Ten Commandments they're always jabbering about, but as for rules they are sworn to uphold and protect, their theme song is Judas Priest's, "Breakin' the Law" (they sing the song quietly I imagine, however, considering that the crooner of the original tune is a "sodomite").

What rule of the day have our Rule-breaker friends set their sights on as of late? Filibuster. That's right — a 200 year old rule that grants the minority contingent of our governing body the power to extend debate and thus prevent a vote on a particular issue. This is scary for the conservatives who arrogantly believed that they would be able to control anything they wish in the wake of a second Bush victory with the memory of Sept. 11 still fresh on the mind of the nation.

The filibuster is a tradition; isn't that what the Grand Old Party is steeped in? Why try to break the rules now? If conservatives are so tradition-happy, why would they tinker with one of our oldest systems of checks and balances?

If democrats succeed in filibustering during controversial Supreme Court nominee hearings, republicans will really have to follow the laws they've sworn by; they won't be able to rely on conservative plants on the bench to cast dark shadows over the execution of the law. That simply will not do for the republicans of this country. They voted for repression, economic disparity, religion in schools, gays on a far away planet, scarlet letters for abortion patients, government gags on the press, arts flushed down the crapper, and enough war to kill you, your son or daughter, and 1,500 of your closest friends.

What political party does '(R)' stand for? 'Republicans' at least, but more accurately, 'Rule-breakers.

Republicans figure that if their conservative judges take a seat on the federal bench, they will really have power. They can intervene into private family disputes (RIP, Terri) without a blink of an eye. They can overturn laws like Illsy dominos and restore our nation to the quaint, "traditional" values of the time approximately six years after the end of WWII, when women "worked in the home," marriage was sacrosanct, abortion was unheard of, homosexuality was a mental disorder, interracial relations were heresy, and the nation lived in fear of nuclear attack.

I hope they succeed. I hope the filibuster is scrapped and heinous conservative judges rock the courts. I hope the republicans go so crazy with power and faith and mandates and God that they turn this nation into a police state. I guess when we see the kind of horror that conservatives have in mind firsthand, when it strikes us deep and without reprieve, only then will we understand what kind of terrible fate we face when we place it in the hands of religious and political extremists. People are already seeing this kind of terror on a low, soft setting. What will happen when conservatives pump up the volume?

All this talk of the conservative agenda is enough to make one sad — or bored. Its too bad columnists don't have puppets like on Sesame Street. If we did, I don't think any column would get so upsetting. So kids, lets continue "R-Day" with more instances of Rule-breakers doing what they do best. Imagine the following being spoken by a puppet, just like a conservative columnist. This is fun.

Bill O'Reilly breaks those rules like nobody's business. He claims that the "spin" stops with him and his show, yet his favorite thing to do is interrupt people, cut their microphones, or tell them to "shut up." Isn't that a type of filibuster? More importantly, aren't his actions controlling the "spin"?

Conservatives can't even uphold social rules. In America, if you are caught in a sex scandal, we as a public are supposed to mull it over for years and years (Monica and Bill puppets enter stage right), yet Bill O'Reilly can tell the public that his phone-sex follies are a non-issue? Rule-breaker.

George W. Bush is really concerned with terrorism. He endorses laws to fight terrorism at home and abroad, yet he seems to not even care when his Texas tagalong Tom Delay makes threats against federal judges using some of the same language as the Taliban. Rule-breaker.

Conservatives care a lot about decency. Janet Jackson is a big harlot for bearing her breast at the Super Bowl, yet Dick Cheney can use every swear in the book at a televised press conference and no one says a thing. Rule-breaker.

We could go on and on, kids, but public broadcasting is an enemy of the conservative hand that is gearing up to grip the nation. When you're watching politicians on TV, remember what (R) stands for, eat your vegetables, and break a household rule, just like the President. This message was brought to you by the letter "I" and the number 1.

'Farm to School' deserves support

Emily O'Brien

The one thing most students say about dining commons food is that it lacks a fresh, flavorful taste. So, what if you could enjoy good quality, freshly picked produce grown locally when you head for the dining commons?

By attending today's Taste of UMass event and lending your support to the "buy local" campaign, you could help make this happen. A booth that supports buying locally will be on hand at the event for students to taste locally grown fruits and vegetables harvested from Pioneer Valley farms.

Buying locally grown food improves the quality of produce we eat, preserves our farmlands, and stimulates the local economy. As students of UMass, it is important that we support the local community.

One way we can do that is to demand Dining Services get involved with the local Farm to School Program, which promotes the use of locally grown produce in schools.

Dr. Anne Carter, professor of Plant and Soil Sciences, who runs the program locally, says that the booth will expose students to the finer quality and taste of local produce.

"Students are used to eating produce that has been transported thousands of miles," said Carter. "The quality becomes compromised. Plain and simple, it just doesn't taste the same as what's grown in our backyards."

The goal of UMass Dining Services is to buy 15 percent of its food from local farms; as of now, it's only buying 10 percent. Dining Services buys a select amount of produce locally, including all its squash and about 88 percent of the apples served.

The Pioneer Valley Growers Association (PVGA), a cooperative of farmers that will be represented at the Taste of UMass event, provides carrots, potatoes, corn, tomatoes, and cabbage, but is unable to keep up with University's demands. The Farm to School program advocates expanding the local buying base to other farms.

In the summer of 2004, Carter received a grant of $7,000 from Project Bread, an anti-hunger program, to jumpstart a division of the national Farm to School program in Western Massachusetts. The program, which now includes seven area schools, connects schools with local farms and improves the nutritional value of food available in school cafeterias.

By demanding Dining Services to buy more local food we can help to improve the quality of food in the dining commons, protect the environment, and sustain the local farming economy.

Although the focus has been on K-12 schools, the program is expanding into local colleges. For example, Hampshire College currently serves local milk in its dining halls. Carter and students in her Community Service Learning course are working on a campaign to get UMass to buy more local produce.

Carter says a number of administrative barriers stand in the way of UMass buying more local produce. "The University is basically bound to get its produce from distributors offering the best deals, and often, those aren't the local farmers."

Then there is the problem of the sheer size of the university. Farmers face shorter growing seasons, and are generally of a smaller scale, so they find it difficult to produce the kind of volume needed to supply the 20 campus dining facilities, which serve more than 5 million meals a year.

Carter and her students note that buying locally does not necessarily mean spending more. Previous Farm to School experiments have shown that once food service directors establish a relationship with local farmers, they often see a profit.

The next step in enhancing the quality of food available in the campus dining facilities is to devote time and energy to developing an effective "buy local" program that is beneficial for both the University and local farms.

As students of UMass and residents of the Pioneer Valley, we are responsible for protecting and preserving the environment that surrounds us. By demanding Dining Services to buy more local food we can help to improve the quality of food in the dining commons, protect the environment, and sustain the local farming economy.

So, go to the Taste of UMass, make a stop at the "buy local" booth, experience the garden fresh taste of locally grown produce and see why buying local is a better choice for the University and you.

The greatest day

Matthew Burke

It seems that the news is always dominated by things that are generally considered negative. Whether it is an Ebola outbreak in Africa or a Marine killed in Afghanistan, there always seems to be something to remind us of the evil in the world — staring at us on the front page of every newspaper. Rarely are the stories uplifting. When they are, they must be cherished. Perhaps that is why people love sports.

Sports have become the escape that most of us need to stay sane in a world that sometimes seems terrible. We get through the tough stuff on the front pages and quickly lose ourselves in the news about the Red Sox or the Celtics, Patriots or the Bruins. Which is precisely why Monday was the greatest day we, the New England sports fans, have had in the longest time. Not only did we see Bill Russell, Bobby Orr, Richard Seymour, and a smiling Tedy Bruschi throw out the first pitch at Fenway Park, but we were able to see the Boston Red Sox get their World Championship rings. It was one of the greatest days of my life.

Sports have become the escape that most of us need to stay sane in a world that sometimes seems terrible.

To fully understand what happened yesterday, you have to be a die-hard, card-carrying member of the "Nation." I'm not talking about the Sox fans that got into it heavily after they saw the booze-induced rioting that is a part of our collegiate celebrations. I'm talking about the people like me who still have Ellis Burks' rookie card tacked to their wall at home, or a Wade Boggs poster from 1987, a Bobby Doerr autograph, or a piece of the original Green Monster's face that was torn down in the '70s and replaced by a new, tin façade. For the diehards, for those of us who never thought we'd see the day, Monday's ring ceremony at Fenway will never be forgotten.

We witnessed first hand what the epitome of class is in the return of Derek Lowe and Dave Roberts. Lowe spoke of longing to remain in Boston, I'm sure pissing everyone off in Dodgerland and also reflected on the lack of respect our ownership gave him in not even returning his calls to try and negotiate a deal after the close of last season. He was there anyway, wearing a Sox jersey, smiling, and tipping his cap.

Where was Pedro Martinez? The Sox pursued him hard and actually matched his demands before he signed with the New York Mets. The day of the ceremony, Pedro was in New York, where they unveiled a billboard the size of his ego with his picture on it. Word in the New York press is that he told the Sox ownership to shove the ring.

D-Lowe showed he was the bigger man, the classier individual, and a Red Sox immortal. Roberts is probably lesser known around the league, but leaving the Padres and wearing a Sox uniform for one more day was a very classy thing to do. Even my man, Ellis Burks, came back to say goodbye after retiring at the end of last season. He started his career here and he ended it here after many stops in between. I couldn't be happier for him, because this day was not only for the players who took the field and actually beat the Yankees in grand fashion. No, it was also for those who played for the Sox the last 86 years, and for those who watched. For many fans, a title never came in their lifetime.

The highlight of the day for me was seeing the legends of Red Sox past on the field. The championship banner was raised by an old man whom some say was beset by the curse ... Johnny Pesky. In the 1946 World Series against the St. Louis Cardinals, Pesky had held the ball on a relay after Harry Walker's base hit to left center field. Enos Slaughter scored all the way from first base on the play to defeat the Sox that day, and lead to a World Series victory for the Cardinals.

Pesky would say after the game, "I'm the goat. I never expected he'd try to score. I couldn't hear anybody hollering at me above the crowd. I gave Slaughter at least six strides with the delay. I know I could have nailed him if I had suspected he would try for the plate. I'm the goat — no doubt about it."

Seeing him almost sixty years later raising the banner with tears in his eyes was very emotional for anyone who ever loved baseball. They have yet to retire his number because he wouldn't retire even at age 85, almost as if he needed to stay on until his business was finished in Boston. It is now, even though we wish he could stay forever.

In the spirit of Pesky, Teddy Ballgame (Williams), Robert Pershing Doerr, Dom Dimaggio, Jim Lonborg, Carlton Fisk, Fred Lynn, Dwight (Dewey) Evans, Nomah (Nomar Garciaparra), Wade Boggs, The Rocket (Roger Clemens), The Gator (Mike Greenwell), Mel Parnell, The Hit Dog (Mo Vaughn), Luis Tiant, Rico Petrocelli, Jim Rice, Cy Young, The Babe (Ruth), Jimmy Collins, Duffy Lewis, Billy Buck (Bill Buckner), Tris Speaker, Harry Hooper, Bill (The Spaceman) Lee, Joe Cronin, Jimmie Foxx, and Carl Yastrzemski, the Sox hoisted a new banner. Now we can rest easy the curse is officially gone and we have a new reason to smile.

Nas, Fabolous, Drop Kick Murphy's hit the Mullins Center for Spring Concert

BY REID DAVENPORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the University of Massachusetts, the Spring Concert has been the most anticipated event of the year for UMass students. The event, put forth by the University Productions and Concerts [UPC], WMUA, SGA and the Student Activities Center, has had headliners such as Ludacris, 50 Cent, and Busta Rhymes over the past few years. While the headliners in the past have been big names, students have appeared to be disappointed with the events. But this year's headliners, an interesting set-up of music styles, may pack the Mullins Center.

The first act that has been added to the list is famed hip-hop artist, Fabolous. Recently, the hip-hop star released his third album entitled, "Real Talk," featuring the hit single, "Breathe."

"My songs are not just catchy songs and good beats," Fabolous said on his website. "That's easy. I study my own songs and I'm a big critic of myself. I won't be happy until I feel like everything is hot and I'm perfectly satisfied."

Fabolous, with his heavy beats, cocky attitude, and a solid line of hit songs, will undoubtedly prepare a packed Mullins center for a high-energy concert.

The next act added to the list is controversial rapper Nas. The New York native has had a career full of hits such as "Hate Me Now," "One Mic," "If I Ruled the World (Imagine That)," and "I Can." Nas' controversy spoused when it became rumored that he had "sold out" for commercializing himself with MTV videos. He then got into a heated lyrical battle with popular rap artist Jay-Z.

Part two of Eve's awful night: yoga and pilates in a gross jail cell

Original Sin
Eve

PART TWO:

I must have waited thirty minutes before the officer with the hat unlocked my cell door.

"Walk this way please," he ordered as I turned toward him.

"Where are we going?" I asked, half standing with my legs still crossed.

He looked at me and sighed deeply. "I'm taking you to another room, we will be finished shortly."

I grimaced in pain as he led me down the hall. "Officer, I really need to use the bathroom, can I just go now before anything else?" I was actually pleading for temporary relief.

"Well, the last time I checked, it would be kinda hard to pee with cuffs on!" he scoffed in reply to his own wit. I rolled my eyes and entered an intimate, closet-sized room with a camera faced directly in front of a blank beige wall. "Stand against the wall, and place your feet on the markers."

A tired looking female officer began frisking me head-to-toe but stopped when she reached my midsection. "Should we remove the belly ring as well?" She looked at the officer with the hat and he shook his head.

"No, that should be fine. But take everything else off." My eyes widened in fear. She took my earrings, my rings, my hair elastics, my belt, and my shoes. I was completely stripped of my identity.

"Are you going to put me in those cute striped jail clothes, too?" I asked sarcastically. Neither of them answered. I looked across the hall and noticed my friend pacing his cell furiously. He looked like a wild animal trapped helplessly amongst the corruption of man. I couldn't help but smile. Moments later, I had answered questions, given my fingerprints, and finished a fairly friendly conversation with the man that arrested me without reason. "No hard feelings," he said as he put me back in to the cell, this time, without the cuffs. "Now you can use the bathroom all night long." he slammed the door shut and walked away.

I scanned the room for an escape route by instinct. I looked at the toilet, then at the camera facing the toilet. I was defeated. There was absolutely nothing I could do but curl up in the corner, away from the toilet and camera, and cry.

Meanwhile, my angry friend decided to use his time to preach to his cellmates. "We must rise up against the f#nsert expletive) system! The police are supposed to protect us, the innocent citizens of this country! Instead they arrest college kids to get a paycheck. They don't care about us! They just want to please their boss! I didn't kill anyone, I follow the laws! This system needs to be changed! Let me hear an A#insert expletive)men!"

I heard them clap their hands, bang on the walls, and begin singing as if we were in a Gospel church. I wiped my tears off my face and began laughing. Suddenly, my cell door swung open and two Smith girls entered. I sat up and felt sudden relief that I had company. "Hey, what are you in for?"

They sat down and explained their story. Coincidentally, it turned out that they had hosted a party that I was on my way to that evening. "Well," I said. "At least I didn't miss anything." They laughed briefly and then the room fell silent.

"Hey, let's do something. Does anyone know any calming techniques to pass the time?"

One of the Smith girls leapt up and answered, "Let's do some Yoga! I know enough to guide us through a routine!" We all agreed this was a great idea. We scrambled to our chosen spots and began.

Breathe in. Breathe out. Reach arms over your head. And down again. One. Two. Three. And up.

I believe this lasted long enough for all of us to gain new perspective of our situation. Maybe security would too. After we were completely stretched out and motivated, the second girl offered her skill, "Hey, I know Pilates!" We all smiled and began her routine.

We were breathless by the end, but our abs would thank us the next day. I finally understood how people get so fit in jail, what else could anyone do?

We collapsed onto the floor and caught our breath. "I don't know how people can survive prison without going insane!" I said. They both nodded in agreement, and suddenly the cell door re-opened.

"You're out," the officer said to me. I stood up quickly, and looked over at them. "Bye guys, I'll see you in court." They waved goodbye and I made my exit, passing my two friends in the cells across the hall. "Bye boys. Have a good night!" I smiled playfully and re-accessorized myself.

Another officer grabbed my arm tightly and shoved me out the back door without a word. I looked around the vacant lot in confusion. It was cold, dark, and pouring rain. I had no idea what time it was, or if my friends had come to pick me up. All I knew was I needed a cigarette. I walked to Main Street and turned on my phone, seven new voice messages, and a text from my girlfriend that she is on her way. I sat down and listened to them.

"Hey, it's me. I'm in Amherst for one night only. Where are you? Call me back when you get this." It was my one love of last year. Just my luck. I put my phone down and sighed heavily. What a night.

Sonic Youth still 'Kool Thing'

BY NICK ROMANOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sonic Youth
Academy of Music
Northampton
April 14th

Very few bands in modern music have been influential, experimental, and important; all while flying in very plain sight of the mainstream radar. Sonic Youth, Northampton residents and international experimental-rock deities, may be the biggest and best of them all (ignoring Radiohead, who certainly fit the criteria but owe a tremendous debt to Sonic Youth for setting and breaking the mold). The fact that Sonic Youth has been performing for over twenty years, the past fifteen of which have been on a major label despite little-to-no MTV and radio support, is impressive but is merely secondary to the sheer quality of their work.

The band will be performing a special benefit show at the Academy of Music tonight in Northampton as part of a brief U.S. tour before flying over for a string of shows in Europe next month. While these shows may ostensibly be promoting the band's latest album, last summer's "Sonic Nurse," fans and newcomers alike should look forward to a diverse set list. While "Nurse" tracks are bound to be peppered in (which is welcome as the album is as endearing, creative, and likeable as anything the band has done), the band probably will play songs from all stages of their career, as this is what they usually do.

As good as Sonic Youth's recorded output is, there is an inimitable quality to their live show that makes a Sonic Youth appearance a must-see. For one, there is the charm of seeing a band full of 40-somethings, especially singer/guitarist Thurston Moore and singer/bassist/guitarist Kim Gordon, that still look and act like the 20-nothings they were when the band started. Even guitarist/singer Lee Ranaldo and drummer Steve Shelley, who show their age a bit more then Moore and Gordon, have the energy and inherent coolness that Sonic Youth is known for. Of course, what the band is really known for is their musical talent, and though they load their albums up with track after track of amazing and mind-blowing songs, they are most alive on stage.

Aided by guitarist/bassist Jim O'Rourke, who was added as a fifth member just a few years ago, the band opens up the already expansive songs and often mutate into, or out of, extended jam sessions full of feedback, noise, and astounding atmosphere. If the idea of Sonic Youth jamming "Expressway To Yr Skull" for about 20 minutes doesn't appeal to you, then firstly, this show is not for you and secondly, what on earth is wrong with you?

Even the most grizzled, old-school Sonic Youth fans happily admit that every show is a new and unique experience. The band straddles a very unique line of being able to jam and improvise brilliantly for extended periods of time while being able to stay definitively away from being a 'jam band.' Sonic Youth never loses track of a song or the audience, they are simply and quite literally musical geniuses.

In addition to being a huge treat for old fans, the live show is also the best place for a new fan or curious party to really check out Sonic Youth. The band has such a large recorded body of work it is intimidating. In concert, not only is there a chance to preview songs from all eras of the band's career, but also experience the creative energy and playfulness that may be lost on a CD. The songs themselves aren't nearly as unapproachably odd as some press would lead you to believe. While sometimes songs are washed out in a sea of noise it's not out of the ordinary for Sonic Youth to have rocking riffs and hooks such as in fan favorites like "Teenage Riot", "Kool Thing", and "Catholic Block" (in fact, even non-fans have to admire the dazzling, but not flashy, guitar playing and songwriting). Compared to their favorite avant-garde composers Sonic Youth is essentially pop music, and the band seems to love being stuck in between pop, alternative, punk, and the truly avant-garde.

Fans of the band know that a Sonic Youth performance is a can't-miss event but for those that have never heard the legendary band before and want to give it a shot: the Academy of Music in Northampton seems like the best place to head to.

The Northampton based group, Sonic Youth, has been known for over 20 years as the go-to "cool" band in MA. Even after years of performing, the group remains influential, experimental, and important.

New alternate reality Web site game generates quite a buzz

BY ELLEN LEE
KNIGHT RIDDER

The pay phone on the Berkeley, Calif., street corner started ringing at the pre-arranged hour.

"Don't hang up," said the woman on the other line. "If you really are who I think you are, I must tell you something."

The cryptic telephone call contained a clue to an unusual game that thousands of players around the globe were playing.

Called "I Love Bees," the game sent players racing to pick up calls from the San Francisco Bay Area to Australia, examining Web sites for hidden messages, and solving online puzzles and riddles. Their mission: to piece together the mystery of an artificial intelligence from the future that had crash-landed in the present and taken over ilovebees.com, the supposed Web site of a Napa, Calif., beekeeper.

"I Love Bees" is part of an emerging genre known as alternate reality gaming, the latest incarnation in the thriving $10 billion gaming industry.

Think of an alternate reality game as a conspiracy come to life, one that the players must investigate and bring out into the open. Or an interactive story whose plot is affected by the players. Players become immersed in a fantasy world as they interact with the game's characters through e-mails and telephone calls. Players often compare it to falling through the rabbit hole, a la "Alice in Wonderland."

"It's like reading a really good novel that will reach out and grab you," said Steve Peters, founder of the Alternate Reality Gaming Network, a Web site devoted to just that. Alternate reality games "go beyond that. It creates a universe in our universe that is real and dynamic."

The original alternate reality game debuted in 2001. A team from Microsoft Corp. created "The Beast," which promoted the futuristic Steven Spielberg film "A.I."

That same group has now gone on to form 42 Entertainment in Emeryville, Calif., banking on the surging interest in alternate reality gaming. Last year, it produced "I Love Bees" as part of the marketing campaign for Microsoft's wildly anticipated Xbox game "Halo 2."

The success of "I Love Bees" is fueling increased interest in the genre and its potential as a form of viral marketing. Simultaneously, alternate reality gaming as a

Nas has recently been dealing with rival rap artists 50 Cent for lyrics imposed against him, but he is more concerned with his work than replying to the comments. Nas should be ready to keep the crowd energy on high.

This year's headliner will no doubt have a giant line of students waiting for hours to get their hands on the best tickets to be as close to this native band as possible. They gave a memorable theme to a history-making series of events in 2004. This year's headliners are, Boston's own, Dropkick Murphy's.

The Dropkick Murphy's are possibly the biggest punk band out of Boston since the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. Formed back around 1995, they have grown from a simple punk group to a Celtic-punk hit. They have sold out nine of their past ten shows and are set to be part of this summer's Warp Tour. Their unique Celtic-Punk sound helped propel the band as they moved up from being an underground band that sold around 150,000 records just by word of mouth, to the big time, bag piping, boys of Boston.

The band got even bigger last year by producing the hit single "Tessie," which was labeled as the song that would help break an 86-year-old curse. Even after they had their hand at pushing the curse out of Boston, the song was used in the new "MVP Baseball 2005" video game by Electronic Arts in celebration of the Red Sox's victory.

After a string of mild Spring Concerts that had all the talents, but just could not deliver strong performances, this year's artists will undoubtedly be set to blow the roof off the Mullins Center on May 1 at 6:30pm. Tickets go on sale Friday April 15 at 10 a.m. at the Mullins Center Box Office. Tickets are free for UMass students with a valid ID, $15 for Five College student with valid IDs, and $35 for the general public. UMass students must present their own IDs to receive a ticket.

New game, I Love Bees, reshapes genre

whole has also attracted more and more players as access to the Internet, and such online tools as instant messaging, blogs and chat rooms, have become more pervasive. Already, the television show "Crossing Jordan," the short-lived series "Push, Nevada," and BMW are among those that have used an alternate reality game element to attract viewers and consumers.

Alternate reality gaming is also getting academic scrutiny. "I Love Bees" is the subject of an exhibit at the University of California at Berkeley exploring the game and its impact on culture and society.

Seeing a game like "I Love Bees" succeed is exciting, said Greg Neimeyer, an assistant professor of art practice, film studies and new media at UC Berkeley, who has been studying it. But he added that it also raises questions about blending reality and fantasy.

"Games provide relief from daily life," he said. "If they're not separate from daily life, it's not going to work anymore. The real risk is you don't know if you're playing a game or not."

Part of the thrill for players, however, is that the game is shrouded in mystery. No one knew the identity of the game designers, the so-called Puppetmasters who pull the strings of the game. No one knew how the game would unfold. Microsoft deliberately stayed mum on the connection between "I Love Bees" and "Halo 2."

At first, no one was even sure the game had begun. Last summer, a movie trailer promoting "Halo 2" ended with the brief flicker of the Web site "Ilovebees.com." Jars of honey were also sent to 16 players active in the alternate reality gaming community.

Nevertheless, news of the game spread quickly through word of mouth and online postings. In the first two days, more than 100,000 people hit the Ilovebees.com site.

Players who went to the Web site saw an innocuous Napa beekeeper's home page that appeared to have been hacked. A few weeks later, a series of global positioning system coordinates were listed. Players did not know it at the time, but they marked the locations of pay phone booths that the game designers had scouted out in advance.

"No one knew what was going to happen," said Adam Bliss, a UC Berkeley math graduate student who had assembled on the Berkeley street corner on the first day the telephones started ringing. "I'm not a morning person, and not much will get me up at that hour, but I had a hard time sleeping because I was excited about what was going to happen the next day."

When the telephone rang, Dan Fabulich, a software engineer who lives in Berkeley, picked it up. "It was a very, very exciting moment," he said. "There were dozens of people around. We looked at each other and were like, what do we do?"

Fabulich answered the phone and spoke to the pre-recorded voice of Melissa, also known as the "Operator," one of the central characters of the game. He was prompted to answer a trivia question to show he was familiar with the game and was rewarded with a clue.

Players like Fabulich and Bliss became part of online communities, where they worked as a unit to piece together the mystery. They developed software to map the GPS coordinates and to organize teams of players to go out and pick up the calls, which were scattered around 1,400 phone booths. One even braved a hurricane to answer a call.

Behind the scenes, the Puppetmasters at 42 Entertainment worked feverishly to keep the game thrilling. They created a special database to handle the pay phone calls and hired actors to play the characters in the game. To pump up the drama, the game's characters sent personal e-mails to the players and made live calls at all hours of the day. The game was constantly on. The Puppetmasters deliberately planned the next chapter in the narrative only a few weeks in advance so that the players could affect it.

"If Moby Dick were an alternate reality game, you would see a whale go by," said Sean Stewart, a science fiction author who was one of the key designers of "I Love Bees" and "The Beast." "Ahab would call you or a harpoon would come out of a television set."

Added Elan Lee, the lead designer of "I Love Bees" and "The Beast". "The premise that the game offers is it's an opportunity to live the life of an action adventure hero. It's an opportunity to make your life bigger than it is. I think no matter who you are, there's something about that promise that is really appealing and exciting."

But unlike traditional games, "I Love Bees" lasted just three months, leading up to the release of Halo 2. The game acted as a prequel for the action in Halo 2, as aliens known as the Convenant invade Earth and threaten its existence.

Did it work? Absolutely, said Chris Di Cesare, director of global Xbox marketing at Microsoft, who commissioned the project for an undisclosed sum.

On its first day, "Halo 2" sold 2.4 million copies, amassing $125 million in sales, and has since sold a total of 6.5 million copies. Granted, Halo 2 already had an intense following. But the "I Love Bees" campaign broadened that audience, reaching out, for instance, to the science fiction fan base, Di Cesare said. It also generated buzz, so to speak, as word about "I Love Bees" spread.

"It was a bit of a gamble, to try something like 'I Love Bees,'" he said. But "the dollars paid off."

The founding members of 42 Entertainment have also taken a gamble. Founded about a year ago, the company is betting that it can make money by producing alternate reality games as a subtle means of advertising, particularly to target an audience that has become immune to traditional advertising.

"Instead of building a larger neon sign, we create subtle and hidden campaigns that they find on their own," said President Joe DiNunzio.

The company estimates that some 10 million unique visitors hit the "I Love Bees" Web site and checked out the game. Of those, 2 million followed its progress from behind the scenes. About 10,000 played the "I Love Bees" game intensely. Word spread, too, as players answering telephone calls in public were forced to explain to perplexed spectators that they were participating in a promotion for "Halo 2."

"The genre is still in its infancy," Lee said. But since "I Love Bees," "the demand for more projects like this and to innovate like this has been extreme. We're really excited."

Nationals prepare for Diamondbacks in first home game

By HOWARD FENDRICH
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — As a kid in the 1940s, Bowie Kuhn ran the hand-operated scoreboard for the original Washington Senators at now-departed Griffith Stadium. As the commissioner of Major League Baseball decades later, the native Washingtonian tried in vain to keep a team in the nation's capital.

On Thursday night, Kuhn plans to be among the 46,000 or so in the RFK Stadium crowd when the Nationals make their home debut against the Arizona Diamondbacks — the city's first regular-season major league game since Sept. 30, 1971.

"It's a very sentimental thing for me," Kuhn said. "It was just a matter of time before baseball returned."

The night caps a series of celebrations marking that return: the first spring training game, an April 5 exhibition game and dress rehearsal at RFK, and the April 4 opening day game at Philadelphia. If this is the last party, it's also the biggest, with President Bush slated to throw out the ceremonial first pitch and more than two hours of pregame festivities featuring appearances by 10 former Senators.

"Everybody's looking forward to it," pitcher Zach Day said. "We know it's going to be a long day, but everybody's excited for the day to come."

Washingtonians have pined for a ballclub to call their own ever since the Senators left for Texas 34 years ago. That was the last time any major league team switched cities; it also was the second time D.C. lost a club.

This time, Beltway baseball fans are the beneficiaries of dwindling local support for the Montreal Expos, who were given a new town, a new nickname and new uniforms. But the roster is mostly unchanged, and the Nationals' only real household name belongs to someone who won't use a bat or glove Thursday: Frank Robinson, a Hall of Fame player who 30 years ago became the majors' first black manager.

Still, the Nationals are tied for first in the NL East after beating the Atlanta Braves 11-4 Wednesday to improve to 3-4, all on the road. Every other major league club already has hosted a game this season. Then again, after more than 12,000 days between home games, what's another couple of weeks, right?

Kuhn felt a personal sense of disappointment when he couldn't persuade Senators owner Bob Short to keep the team in the city or to sell it to someone who would.

"This is a happy day for Washington and a very sad day for Canada and Montreal. Montreal was given every chance, and it's about time Washington got its chance," Kuhn, 78, said in a telephone interview. "I can hardly wait to see what happens. We know how they support the Redskins. I'm looking for something like that for a good, competitive Nationals team."

Seemingly no matter the quality of play, the buzz around town is as loud as the team's bright red caps with the curly white "W" that have become ubiquitous from Capitol Hill to Georgetown.

Baseball is back!

"We expect a lot of excitement. The fans are going to show up and root for us," third baseman Vinny Castilla said. "They've been waiting for this for a long time."

Nearly 2 million tickets already have been bought for the 81 home games — the Expos drew fewer than 750,000 last season — and Joseph Deoudes might just be the most powerful person in Washington these days. The Nationals' director of ticket sales is certainly among the most popular, fielding calls from congressional staffers, lobbyists, lawyers and others hoping to score seats for the home debut or later in the season.

"People are going to crazy, foolish lengths to get seats," Deoudes said. "I'm so behind on voice mails, and a good number of them are people trying to work any angle possible to get in."

This is, after all, a city where trading on influence isn't merely a way of doing business, it's a way of life. As Nationals president Tony Tavares put it: "People can be a little bit more insistent in this marketplace."

Tavares and the rest of the team's front-office staff only recently moved into their headquarters at the stadium, where last-minute touchups were made Wednesday.

Hundreds of extra chairs were being set up on the field in front of the stands, the sort of additional seating used for World Series games. At the nearest Metro station, a yellow sign with black block letters announced, "Stadium this way," and a giant arrow pointed to an escalator.

With less than a day left, it wasn't quite clear what to call the site of the big game — negotiations were continuing on a multi-million-dollar deal to sell the stadium's naming rights.

AP Sports Writer Paul Newberry in Atlanta contributed to this story.

first pitch of the day, junior Brian Nutting doubled to deep center to score Bush. Following suit in the next at-bat, freshman Mike Lyon, who went 3-for-6, sent a line drive to left field for a three-run homer. Lyon's first career collegiate home run started the early beginnings of a blowout. After adding two more runs, Northeastern held a commanding lead, 10-0, after only three innings.

The top of the Huskies' (10-14) order, junior Chris Emanuele, junior Arunas Sidhu and Heriot, did most of the damage, going 5-of-12 with two homers, seven RBIs and seven runs scored.

"I guess you'd have to be impressed, though I try to look at it from our point of view," Stone said. "[Northeastern] swung the bat well, but we didn't execute pitching-wise. Without a change-up or curveball, you're going to get hit, and that's what happened."

"We're looking for [pitchers] to step up and help us win games," he added. "It's a tough search right now."

On the mound, Huskie freshman Kris Dabrowiecki (3-1) limited the Minutemen to three singles in five innings. He struck out four batters and only walked two. Northeastern relievers Jim Madison and Tim Bush combined to pitch four innings and allowed only two hits while striking out five batters.

Though Twomley's 12-game hitting streak ended two days ago, freshman Pat Garritty continued his hitting streak to eight games after going 1-for-2 yesterday. However, Twomley received a walk in his first at-bat of the game to finish his consecutive walk total at six.

Morin said. "Pitchers have been pitching me outside, and I'm finally going with it."

The Minutewomen started slowly in the second game, falling behind 1-0 in the third inning, but once again they put together a big rally, scoring four runs in the fourth and five in the fifth.

The Maroon and White scored all of its runs in the fourth with two outs. Stefanoni drove in Lauren Proctor and Morin with a double, and leadoff hitter Hilary Puglia followed with a two-run homer to left-center. Stefanoni recorded five RBIs on the day.

In the fifth, UMass greeted new pitcher Danielle Cyr with five straight hits, resulting in five runs and the second mercy-rule win of the day.

Three consecutive singles by KJ Kelley, Denise Denis and Pam Sulick scored one run and left runners on first and second. Proctor doubled in two runs with a shot to the gap in left-center, and Morin followed with a triple to almost the exact same spot. Morin scored the final run on a wild pitch.

Jenna Busa went the distance to improve her record to 6-4, only giving up one run on one hit while fanning six.

Senior pitcher Barb LaFogg improved her season record to 12-7 in a win yesterday. LaFogg has an A-10-high 132 strikeouts this season.

Long road for UMass

"We have to shut down cutters for St. Bonaventure in particular," Bolduc said. "One of their better players is Kelly Chevez, and we have to be aware of where she is on the field. We have to shut down their fast break. They have three goalies that are splitting a lot of time, but they are all very good so we have to finish and take care of mental mistakes."

The Minutewomen's Achilles heel this year has been closing out their opponents. Against Boston College on April 2 and St. Joseph's on Sunday, UMass had the chance to put the game away but could not convert. The statistics, however, speak to another problem.

"We're the number one finishing team in the Atlantic 10," Bolduc said. "Unfortunately, we don't shoot enough. We only average 21 shots a game, and that kills us. We just don't shoot enough. Especially against the better goalies like St. Joseph's, we tell them that if there is a better keeper that you have to shoot more. We're working on having more shots on goal, and then hopefully then we'll come up with more W's."

After tomorrow's game against St. Bonaventure, the Minutewomen will play Sunday against Duquesne on the road. The Duquesne squad will be UMass' toughest conference opponent this season, as the Dukes are 8-2 overall and have gone undefeated in three conference games this season (St. Bonaventure, Richmond, George Washington).

Against St. Bonaventure and Duquesne, UMass is 10-1 all-time, going 5-0 against St. Bonaventure, and 5-1 against Duquesne.

Tyson returns to ring

By Howard Fendrich
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Mike Tyson simply laughed after he listened to his next opponent's manager promise an upset.

Then, after standing toe-to-toe with Kevin McBride to pose for photos, Tyson clasped the Irish fighter's hand, patted him on the back and winked.

Is this a kinder, gentler Iron Mike?

"I don't get into the stare-downs and the talking trash. I'm older, so I'm not really too much into that," Tyson said Tuesday. "I don't want to punch a guy in the face before the fight starts."

This from the man who brawled with Lennox Lewis three years ago at a news conference announcing a bout, who vowed to eat Lewis' children, who bit off a piece of Evander Holyfield's ear, who was convicted of rape in 1992.

On Tuesday, in town to announce his fight at the MCI Center on June 11 against McBride, Tyson seemed to alternate personas.

At times, he was introspective or doted on his three children who joined him on stage. At others, he came close to being the Tyson everyone has come to expect: the curiosity promoters hope can still sell tickets and pay-per-view buys even though he's 38 and lost two of his past three fights.

He talked about sinking into depression, called McBride "real cute," labeled himself "probably the worst husband in the world," and told a PR person running the show to "chill out" when she pointed out it was time for more posed photos.

"I just hope these people of Washington, D.C., are prepared to handle this," Tyson said. "It's going to be a train wreck."

It will be the former champion's first fight in nearly a year, and just his second in 28 months. In his most recent outing, at Louisville on July 30, he was stopped in the fourth round by Danny Williams after tearing cartilage in his left knee. Tyson had surgery — the knee is fine, he said Tuesday — and he's been training in Phoenix for three weeks.

The 6-foot-6 McBride, 32-4-1 with 27 knockouts, was originally supposed to be Tyson's opponent for that July bout. Make no mistake, though, this fight is entirely about Tyson. McBride's name wasn't even uttered by master of ceremonies Rock Newman until nearly 20 minutes into Tuesday's event.

"It's a no-win situation for me," said Tyson, 50-5 with two no contests and 44 knockouts. "If I knock him out in two seconds, he's a bum. If he gives me a shellacking, I'm a bum."

For his part, McBride vowed at least three times: "I'm going to shock the world."

"You have to respect every heavyweight in the business, because all it takes is one punch, and I have that punch. I have no fear of Mike Tyson," McBride said

Bats come alive in doubleheader

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Aided by big innings and the long ball, the Massachusetts softball team swept Central Connecticut State (7-18) yesterday in a doubleheader at home. UMass (18-11-1 4-2 Atlantic 10) won both games via the mercy-rule, 8-0 in the opener and 9-1 in the nightcap.

UMass	8
CCSU	0

UMass wraps up a six-game home stand this weekend with doubleheaders against two A-10 foes. UMass will look to extend a season-long seven-game winning streak against Saint Joseph's on Friday at 3 p.m. before taking on Temple on Sunday at noon.

UMass	9
CCSU	1

In Game 1 yesterday, UMass jumped all over CCSU starter Erin Monroe in the first inning, knocking her out of the game after scoring seven earned runs in only 0.2 of an inning.

The Minutewomen sent 12 batters to the plate in the inning, collecting six hits and benefiting from four walks. The big blow came on a three-run homer to left-center by number-nine hitter Kristi Stefanoni.

The home run was the first of the junior's career and gave UMass a 7-0 lead.

"I didn't really think the home run was that big because we had scored prior to that," Stefanoni said. "It was just a momentum builder. What the team did prior to that to get on the board and to get us started really helped us."

Sarah Madris came in to relieve Monroe and finally got the Blue Devils out of the first. Madris combined with Samantha Keltos to quiet the UMass bats the rest of the way, allowing only one run over the final 3.1 innings.

The seven-run cushion was more than enough for Barb LaFogg, who once again was dominant at home. LaFogg is a perfect 4-0 at the UMass Softball Complex, and improved her overall record to 12-7. LaFogg recorded nine strikeouts, bringing her A-10 leading total to 132.

UMass secured the mercy-rule win in the fifth inning after Amanda Morin led off with a triple and scored on a pinch-hit single by Jasmine Edwards.

Morin had a big day, going 4-for-5 with two triples and two RBIs in the two games. The number seven batter joined Stefanoni as a big contributor from the bottom of the order.

Candice Molinari sparked the offense from the number-two hole, going 4-for-5 on the day with a walk and a run scored. Molinari was successful on three stolen base attempts, raising her A-10 leading total to 20-for-20.

"Whether it's the leadoff or the number-nine batter, we all contribute," Stefanoni said. "There's no difference between any of us. I love being down there [at the bottom of the order]."

UMass coach Elaine Sortino was pleased with the contributions from the bottom half of the order, especially Morin, who has been on a tear lately.

"I thought Amanda Morin was outstanding today," Sortino said. "I thought all along that this team would have great equality in their ability to drive the ball. Getting the ball in play is critical, and I think we're doing a good job of it."

"I've been doing better at practice, and I've just been seeing the ball really big."

Move over: Junior KJ Kelley is new home run champ of UM softball

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

There have been only a select few Massachusetts softball players who can say they have hit 26 home runs over the course of their collegiate careers.

Former UMass softball regular Scooter Wheeler did it in 2002. Teammate Brandi Cross then did it in 2003. The two alums were the only ones to reach the mark of 26 homers over a span of two years, until last Tuesday, when junior catcher KJ Kelley shattered the record, placing her on a pedestal.

Coming into the 2005 season, Kelley's teammates and coaches were not focused on when, or how, the home run record would be broken, but with two years remaining in her college career, time was on her side.

In a 7-6 loss against Bethune Cookman on March 6 at the 2005 Doubletree Worth Invitational, Kelley recorded her fourth home run over a span of eight games this season.

Two homers remained for the record, but Kelley's bat quieted down through the rest of March and the beginning of April. With her career count standing still at 25, an ankle injury then limited Kelley's playing time for the end of March.

After a home run dry streak of over a month, Kelley hit No. 26 and consequently tied the record in a win over George Washington on Saturday. It didn't take long (three days), however, for her to get No. 27.

Junior KJ Kelly recorded her seventh home run of the season in a win against UConn on Tuesday. Kelley now holds the all-time career record at UMass with 28 homers.

The record breaker was in a non-conference battle against the UConn Huskies on Tuesday afternoon. The homer was the first run of the day — but would not be the last — in a back and forth shootout between the rivals. Down 6-3 in the top of the sixth inning, increasing her record tally was not the primary intentions of Kelley, but she recorded No. 28 to keep UMass in the game. The Minutewomen went on to win the game in a close one-run lead in the 10th inning.

Breaking home run records is something Kelley has become familiar with, as she also broke the record at her high school in Rainier, Ore., hitting 20 by the end of her senior year.

Kelley picked up where she left off in high school when she recorded eight homers during her freshman campaign for the Maroon and White. The chunk of her home runs came during her sophomore year when she hit 13, tying an A-10 record and breaking the single-season record at UMass.

While home runs are what Kelley is notable for in the record books, UMass coach Elaine Sortino sees Kelley as an all-around contributor. Kelley holds a team-high slugging percentage with a mark of .759 and has 18 RBIs on top of her seven home runs on the season. Kelley is also third in the A-10 in doubles on the season.

With a team that has three freshman contributing to each game in 2005, drilling homers appears to be a contagious act lately, as Kelley is not the only Minutewoman hitting balls out of the park.

Six homeruns have been hit in the last four games by players other than Kelley. Junior Kristi Stefanoni hit one in Game 1 of yesterday's doubleheader, and senior Hilary Puglia nailed one in Game 2. Two understudies of Kelley, freshman Lauren Proctor and sophomore Amanda Morin, hit back-to-back homers in Tuesday's nail biter against UConn, and Morin recorded her first career homer in last Saturday's GW victory.

Minutemen routed by Huskies

After pulling off a dramatic win in the last inning over UConn Tuesday, the Massachusetts baseball team could not produce at the plate, on the mound or even in the field yesterday, as Northeastern pounded the Minutemen, 14-0, at Earl Lorden Field.

The Minutemen (4-19 0-6 Atlantic 10), who finally broke their 12-game losing streak against UConn, look to rebound from yesterday's loss against Saint Joseph's this weekend in their last home series before a seven-game road trip. Saturday will feature an afternoon doubleheader slated to begin at noon with the third game scheduled for Sunday at noon.

Junior pitcher Matt Torra and the UMass baseball team are struggling this season. Torra leads the team with an ERA of 1.50.

The Huskies' offensive output produced 14 hits, including three home runs, as opposed to the Minutmen's five hits. The 14-0 defeat is the worst loss suffered by the Minutemen since their 18-3 loss to Xavier on March 27.

"I wasn't impressed at all with our effort today," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We didn't compete on the mound, and I felt offensively that we gave up. We didn't compete and you can't do that. There is no excuse for that."

In the top of the second inning, the Huskies loaded the bases on an infield single, a walk and a hit batsman. With the bases juiced, senior Jeff Heriot sent a towering shot to deep left-center that eventually found its way over the fence for a grand slam and a 4-0 lead.

Northeastern (10-14 3-0 America East) put the game out of reach in the next inning by putting up a six-run effort. Senior Tim Bush kicked off the rally in the first at-bat of the inning with a double off the left-center wall. After Bush advanced to third on a ground out, sophomore Dan Milano walked to put runners on the corners.

UMass starter Brent Tarasuik was pulled after giving up six runs on three hits in 2.1 innings pitched and was replaced by redshirt freshman Chris Sargory. On Sargory's

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will look to take control in the Atlantic 10 conference this weekend, with crucial games tomorrow against St. Bonaventure (7-3) and Sunday against the Duquesne Dukes, who are currently first place in the Atlantic 10 (8-2).

After a 12-11 victory against La Salle on Friday and a 10-7 loss to Saint Joseph's on Sunday, the Minutewomen go on the road looking to better their in-conference record. UMass has had a full week to prepare for this weekend's road games, and coach Carrie Bolduc believes that they are ready.

"I think the girls are focused," Bolduc said. "I think it's a matter of knowing the game plan, being mentally prepared and just playing our game."

The Minutewomen departed the campus at 4 a.m. this morning to catch a 6:45 flight to New York. The brutal schedule could prove to be a deterrent for the UMass squad, as for most of the team this will be a first-time experience (13 of 24 are freshmen).

"It's our first long trip for our freshmen, so we've got a lot going on this weekend," Bolduc said. "These girls know how to adjust. That's the good thing about kids is that they know how to adjust. We have a lot of time tomorrow traveling, and we'll get there early so we'll have a lot of time to relax so we'll be OK."

The Maroon and White head into tomorrow's contest with a 4-7 record overall and a 1-1 record in conference, while St. Bonaventure has not won a game against an Atlantic 10 opponent, losing to Duquesne, George Washington and Richmond. The conference games have caused Bonaventure its most trouble, as the Bonnies have gone undefeated outside

Bush honors Patriots again

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush welcomed the New England Patriots to the White House on Wednesday, something that has become a tradition as the team has won the Super Bowl during three of his four years in office.

"You know, the commentators would say, Well, they're not the flashiest bunch, they're not the fanciest bunch,'" the president said during a ceremony in the Rose Garden, the team's three Super Bowl trophies glittering in the sunlight on a table. "They just happen to be the best team. They're the team that showed that when you play together, when you serve something greater than yourself, you win."

The team defeated the Philadelphia Eagles on Feb. 6 in Jacksonville, Fla., by a score of 24-21.

About 30 players from the team's normal 54-man roster attended, including quarterback Tom Brady and linebacker Tedy Bruschi, who is recovering from a stroke suffered just after he played in the Pro Bowl in February. Bush saluted Bruschi, saying, "I congratulate you on showing such incredible courage on the field and off the field. There's a lot of people that were praying for you, I know."

The president credited the team with inspiring the Boston Red Sox, who won their first world championship last fall in 86 years. He also thanked a group of seven players, including linebacker Larry Izzo and offensive lineman Matt Light, who flew down early and visited with wounded soldiers at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., and Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

"I think you saw firsthand the definition of courage when you saw those young soldiers who had been wounded that are working hard to overcome their injuries. I can assure you that your visit helped lift their spirits," Bush said.

Brady told reporters later, "To go there and see those troops, ... it makes what we do seem so unimportant."

The Patriots presented the president with a team ball from Super Bowl XXXIX. Head coach Bill Belichick, who was teased by the president for wearing a business suit, also presented Bush with one of his trademark gray hooded sweat shirts, triggering laughter from an audience that included Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was Bush's opponent in last fall's presidential election, and Rep. Martin T. Meehan, D-Mass., a Patriots season ticket-holder.

There were two other moments of laughter.

Recalling last year's team visit to the White House, Bush told the team: "I think I said last time there's a chance you'll be back. I wasn't sure about me." As the audience laughed and Bush winked at Kerry, the president added: "I'm confident I'll be back next year. And the way you've been playing, there's a good chance you will be, too."

Team owner Robert Kraft also broke up the audience when he noted the team's string of recent visits and said, "Next year, if we're blessed to be here, we'll follow Senator Kennedy's advice and bring the cheerleaders."

Someone sitting in the audience near Kennedy and Kraft said the senator actually suggested that Kraft bring the Patriots cheerleaders to the military hospitals, not the White House.

Fenway parking pricey

BOSTON (AP) — Mayor Thomas M. Menino, saying "I blew my top" when told someone paid $100 to park while attending a Red Sox game at Fenway Park, said he will ask the City Council to cap fees and stop private lot owners around the ballpark from gouging baseball fans.

"We are going to come up with a strategy to make sure this doesn't happen in the future," said Menino, who found out about the $100 tab while attending the Red Sox home opener Monday. "My goal is to have control over the fees. This may be the market, but it's not right."

On game days, gas stations, some retail centers and at least one hotel dedicate parking spaces for fans. Monday, several lots charged $60, and Leahy's Mobil station on Boylston Street charged a Boston Globe photographer $100 to park.

There is no telephone listing for Leahy's Mobil.

A worker at VIP Parking said his lot charged $50 for Monday's game, and said he knew of no place other than Leahy's that charged $100.

"I don't think there's any set system," said Jordan Flower, who works at another lot near the ballpark. "It's basically how greedy you are. It's not based on any numbers; it's just based on greed."

Menino said Tuesday that he will ask the City Council to approve an ordinance to cap parking fees. The exact rate will be determined after a meeting with the lot operators later this week.

During last fall's baseball playoffs, Menino appealed to the operators of 23 city-licensed private lots to voluntarily lower rates.

"The mayor didn't get the voluntary compliance" he sought, said Thomas J. Tinlin, acting commissioner of the Boston Transportation Department.

City officials also want to stop lots from charging more for some games than others, a practice they said began during the Red Sox' championship season last year.

"We need to have price certainty," Tinlin said. "It's unfair for consumers who go to a Yankees game to have to pay $100 and those who go to a Tampa Bay Devil Rays game pay $20."

If lawyers determine that the city cannot regulate the parking fees by ordinance, officials will file a home-rule petition at the Statehouse seeking permission to regulate the fees.

Red Sox spokesman Charles Steinberg said he did not know that any parking lots overcharged fans attending Monday's game. The Red Sox own two lots, but he told the Globe he did not know what the team charged.

Sudanese genocide is subject of UMass discussion

By Meaghan Geisler
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Genocide Reaction Committee held its first meeting Wednesday on the 19th floor of Kennedy Hall. The committee discussed future plans and ideas about the humanitarian issues in Darfur, Sudan.

Currently there is a genocide happening in Sudan. There has been a war going on between a militia group and two rebel armies in that nation. Over the past two years there has been international pressure on the Sudanese government to disarm the militia group, but there has been little evidence of them doing so. The Bush administration has recently declared this situation Genocide, but has not committed any peace keeping troops to the region.

Fourteen people showed up for the meeting on Wednesday. One of these 14 people was Thon Aylei, a 21-year-old sophomore at UMass. He has been living in the United States for four years after moving to this country from Sudan. He says he had to leave Sudan because of a war when he was four years old. He was sent to refugee camps in both Kenya and Ethiopia, where he lived for a total of 11 years.

Aylei stood up in front of the committee and explained that he has been looking for a way to help the people in Sudan, and the Genocide Reaction Committee has made that possible.

Chris Turk, 19, is a sophomore political science major here at UMass. He has taken the responsibility of starting the Genocide Reaction Com-mittee. At the meeting he talked about things that were happening in Sudan, such as more than 180,000 people being killed, and more than two million people being displaced from their homes. He also addressed his plans for the committee. Every one of the fourteen people had questions and shared their ideas with the rest of the group.

Turk started off the meeting by discussing what he has been doing to get the committee started. He is currently in the process of registering the committee with the UMass. Once a mission statement is passed in about the committee, UMass will approve it, and they will have access to funding from the school.

Turk is not aware of any other committees on campus that are directly involved in raising funds for Sudan, but is more than willing to work with other groups that are interested in these issues.

A table will be set up within the next week in the Campus Center for the committee and they are waiting to find out what room they will be able to use in the Student Union for their meetings.

One of Turk's main goals is to work with other groups that are concerned with the situation in Sudan, as well as people in surrounding communities. He is currently working on setting up a meeting with the principle of Amherst, High School. He hopes to be able to set up a benefit dance at the high school, to send funds to Sudan.

MEAGHAN GEISLER/COLLEGIAN

UMass students, from left to right, Sara Reynolds, Sean Tierney, and Ellen Gerlach sit in on a discussion by the Genocide Reaction Committee Wednesday evening in Kennedy Hall.

The students at the meeting all were very eager to offer their assistance. Some of the students volunteered their time to pass out flyers in front of the dining halls and another student offered to help put together a food drive.

"I feel like the people who showed up really seemed to be passionate about the issue and I feel the agenda was well received," Turk said after the meeting.

The next meeting will be held on April 20, where each member hopes to bring at least two more people with them. It will be held at 8 p.m. on the 19th floor in Kennedy Hall.

MPAA joins i2hub lawsuits

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Much like what the Recording Industry Association of America did earlier this week, the Motion Picture Association of American filed various lawsuits yesterday against college students, including those at the University of Massachusetts, involved in illegally downloading files online.

On Wednesday, the RIAA sent out lawsuits to select college students that downloaded files from the popular "i2hub." Unlike the RIAA, the MPAA did not disclose how many lawsuits were issued. The RIAA is suing 405 college students from 18 colleges, including 25 students from UMass-Amherst.

The RIAA is also sending out notices to 140 college presidents, informing them about the illegal activity on their campuses. A spokesperson for the MPAA said they are not disclosing how many students are involved because that is not their purpose.

"We're trying to send a message," said Ann Caliguri. She said that the MPAA's message is to bring people who illegally download files online to justice.

The defendants in the lawsuits will be named as "John Doe" because MPAA says they do not know their identities, only their i2hub user names. The MPAA must subpoena the universities involved to reveal the users' Internet Server Protocol address, which would reveal their identities.

Even though the two companies filed their lawsuits at similar time, an anonymous source in the MPAA said that the two did not purposely plan to file suits so closely together.

"The decision to file was made separately," the source said, adding that the RIAA and the MPAA do share information.

The source said that the amount of money to MPAA is seeking varies between lawsuits.

The source also said there's a lot that goes into how much the company seeks, mainly how many movies are downloaded.

"These suits range from a few thousand to hundreds of thousands [of dollars]," he said. According to RIAA President Cary Sherman, the MPAA suits typically settle for about $3,000, which is a little smaller then the amount in which RIAA suits are commonly settled.

Those involved in the suits say that filing the lawsuits sends out a message to college campuses.

"It brings attention to the problem," the source said. "In the case of i2hub and its creator our message is simple," said Motion Picture Association President and CEO Dan Glickman in a press release. "We know who you are and we strongly encourage you to stop facilitating the illegal downloading and trading of movies."

Even though both lawsuits have been issued at college campuses, Caliguri said that the only reason college students are the focus is because they have easier access to things like i2hub.

"Universities tend to be a problem," she said. "College campuses have seen an increase in illegal file sharing."

Caliguri said that access to high-speed internet on college campuses makes downloading easier.

The MPAA said that they are not against advancements in technology, and that simply downloading these hubs are legal.

"Using Kazaa is not illegal," Caliguri said, adding that people break the laws when they start to download and share files.

Caliguri said that Monday at 1:23 p.m. PST, there were 7,070 people who were connected to

Biology professor receives $900K for bacteria research

By Matthew Pilon
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts professor of biology Margaret A. Riley recently received a four-year $900,000 grant from the National Institutes of Health to study the increasing problem of bacterial antibiotic resistance.

Riley studies the often-ignored area of bacteria's evolution and natural defense systems. She plans to use the funding to support graduate research and teaching, and to purchase research supplies, which Riley called "extraordinarily expensive."

The ultimate outcome of the research has been to develop a "more ecologically sound approach that does not overwhelm the bacteria," Riley said.

According to Riley, for the past 20 years many doctors have been doing just that: using antibiotics in viral settings, an approach Riley called "useless," in industrial and agricultural settings.

"We've simply abused [antibiotics]," Riley said.

She says the result of this has been that certain antibiotics , such as those that were once effective in treating urinary tract infections, ear infections, and other bacteria-related illnesses have lost their effect. She notes that most doctors will now just prescribe cranberry juice for a urinary tract infection rather than the now useless antibiotic Trimethiprin.

Riley says the Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus (MRSA) bacteria causes staph infections. As the name implies, this particular bacteria has become resistant to the antibiotic Methicillin, which happens to be the only known effective treatment of MRSA. Currently, if the immune system is weak and a staph infection occurs, death can result, Reilly says.

According to the Center for Disease Control, nearly two million people get an infection in the hospital each year. Of the two million, about 90,000 die as a result. According to Riley, this costs taxpayers approximately $2 billion a year.

The ample grant has given Riley the opportunity to address these problems head on.

"This grant, being as large as it is, will allow me to focus on the research and not worry about the money aspect," she said.

Riley has also created a Springfield-based company called Origin Antimicrobials in conjunction with a Smith college biology professor to market new ecologically sound solutions to the medical community.

Riley's research is conducted in collaboration with the University of Washington and the University of Seattle. For her research, Riley plans to use animal bacteria collected in the outback of Australia with UMass undergraduate alumnus Dr. David Gordon of the Australian National University with whom Riley has worked for the past 15 to 20 years.

According to Riley's research, it is now believed by many in the scientific community that bacteria have been capable of developing resistance since the beginning of time as opposed to an earlier view that resistant bacteria are a recent development.

The bacteria collected in Australia will have little if any exposure to classic antibiotics and therefore will be perfect to screen for the gene that confers the antibiotic resistance. Riley will explore and contrast the evolution of antibiotic resistance of the natural bacteria to that of the clinical bacteria. A successful outcome will hopefully lead to more effective antibiotic therapies that will be used to cure bacteria-related illnesses.

Van Meter janitor claiming discrimination by University

By Kathryn Sullivan
Collegian Staff

For more than 10 years, a man named James Castine carefully swept the remnants of parties past at Van Meter Hall in the Central Residential Area at the University of Massachusetts.

To students there, he was known as "Jimmy Star," a name he derived from his Native American grandmother, Star Rivers. This was also the stage name he has used for years while performing with bands, which he says played music ranging from "Jimmy-Hendrix style" rock to country.

Prior to his position as a maintenance worker at UMass, Castine owned a successful hair salon with his wife, who retained the business after their divorce. After the divorce, he came to the University seeking employment. Although janitorial work was not his first choice, he took the position on a temporary basis.

Eleven years later he still worked at UMass because he says he fell in love with the beauty of the Central area and enjoyed the relationships he formed with students, many of whom would often plead with him to join them in jam sessions. A self-proclaimed "neat-freak," Castine fit naturally into his position and was good at it — evaluations of his work were consistently positive.

But Castine can no longer be found in the halls of Van Meter. He has taken early retirement, which he feels he was forced into unfairly by the University.

Castine suffers from the life threatening disease, Hepatitis C, which he contracted during a 1992 blood transfusion. According to the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, the blood supply has been carefully checked for the virus since July 1992. Castine had contracted the disease just months before.

Hepatitis C is a blood-borne virus that can lead to liver damage, liver failure or death. Nearly four million Americans, including approximately 100,000 Massachusetts residents, are currently infected with the virus. Many do not experience any symptoms and are unaware of their diagnosis. By May of 2003, Castine's blood counts showed the virus was infecting his body at alarming rates.

KATHRYN SULLIVAN/COLLEGIAN

This Van Meter Hall bathroom is one of the places where a maintenance worker claims discrimination against him took place.

On May 27, 2003 Castine informed his supervisor, William Bartos. Supervisor of Janitors, that he would have to begin treatment for his Hepatitis C, which would consist of a 48-week planned schedule of Interferon therapy.

He provided proof through a letter from his doctor, Dr. Mohamed Eldaly, M.D., in which he recommended that "Mr. Castine work on a light duty schedule during the duration of his treatment."

According to Castine, Bartos' response to his request set off a series of events that has affected his life for the past two years.

"Mr. Bartos let me know that if I needed modification due to this disability than I will just have to go home," Castine said.

In an official document signed by Mary Jane Quinn, Special Assistant in the Chancellor's office, who has become the spokesperson for the University on this matter, it is stated that "Mr. Bartos patently denies making any representation to Mr. Castine regarding modifications or saying that Mr. Castine would have to go home."

Castine, who desperately wanted to retain his position at the University, informed his doctor the following day that he would not be proceeding with his treatment. He says he feared losing his job, which would cause him to lose his health benefits. Given the severe nature of Hepatitis C and the intensive medical treatment that would be required to sustain his life, this was a gamble Castine says he was not willing to take. Without any health insurance it would be nearly impossible for him to afford treatment necessary for him to survive his illness.

He informed his supervisor of his decision and returned to his normal duties for the University.

As the students began filing out of the dorms for the summer, the maintenance staff prepared for their summer cleaning duties. In past summers, Castine had performed what he calls "detail work," which involved careful, intricate cleaning of the facilities.

This summer, however, Bartos assigned Castine to cleaning garbage cans in the basement of the building for most of the three months.

The Chancellor's office later defended this move stating in an official letter that, "several factors contributed to Mr. Castine's assignment of cleaning waste baskets (not garbage cans) from student dormitory rooms."

The letter went on to explain that this was a clearly identified task of his position — this task was also assigned to four or five other maintainers — and that the decision was made due to his request for light duty while additional information was being sought from his physician.

Castine, however, maintains that he was never notified that this was his "light duty" and that this was the first in a series of events that would lead him to believe that he was being discriminated against for having Hepatitis C.

Janitor claiming his work was scrutinized by bosses

From this point forward, Castine reports that his work was often overly scrutinized and his supervisor and other higher-ranking staff members would personally check the quality of his work. Sometimes several high-ranking staff members would check the bathrooms in one day.

He claims that on several occasions supervisors would actually come into his workspace to watch him work and critique his procedures, which he had fine-tuned for efficiency purposes over the past decade.

Another employee, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, claims that although these actions were not outside of the jurisdiction of the supervisors, this level of monitoring was relatively unheard of in the past.

Castine filed a discrimination complaint with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination in June that stated that for the past three months, "UMass at Amherst discriminated against me by subjecting me to unequal terms and conditions of employment, failing to reasonably accommodate me and threatening to terminate my employment because of my disability."

Tensions continued to mount between Castine and his employer over the next couple of months. He claims during this time he was regularly humiliated and treated with hostility at work. In September, the University filled a response with the MCAD. A response that Castine feels was premature and underhanded because MCAD typically schedules a hearing with both parties, in which the defendant is able to address the accusations, after they complete their formal investigation. In the response, signed by Quinn, it stated that the University "patently denies each of these allegations."

University officials also stated that they had accommodated him and were still awaiting further information from his doctor, which Castine had not yet produced. The letter also disputed his handicap stating that he "has not made a valid allegation that he is a qualified handicapped person" and "he has never claimed that his impairments are of a permanent or persistent nature."

According to the National Hepatitis C Coalition, " There is no true cure for hepatitis C."

In the fall of 2003, Castine was assigned new duties which included maintaining two six-story stairwells instead of one four story stairwell and heavy snow shoveling, to which his doctor wrote a complaint to Edward Mone, Senior Operations Manager and Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

In the letter from Dr. Eldaly stated, "You are allowing further harassment to occur" and "Mr. Castine clearly has an abusive supervisor with the objective to drive Mr. Castine out of his job, his livelihood and his medical treatment."

Castine's complaint to the MCAD was denied due to lack of evidence. He appealed his complaint, adding two witnesses to his claim, and was again denied. Castine wrote one final letter to MCAD in February in which he queried "Are you a state institution protecting another state institution?"

Castine has taken early retirement from his position.

Bartos and his superior, Mone, were contacted but were unable to comment.

Lombardi and Quinn, were unable to be reached for comment.

The real story of a true hero

Jeff Howe

I remember trying to hit home runs over the shrubs in "left field" in my backyard, thinking that I was Mo Vaughn and pretending that the four-foot tall shrubs were the Green Monster.

I remember hanging out down the street, hitting "3-pointers" from inside the free throw line because I was imitating Larry Bird.

They were a couple of my heroes at the time, the people I truly wanted to be in 20 years.

Besides the jokes I could rattle off about Mo's escapades in Providence or Larry Legend's inability to dunk after the age of 30, I'm now realizing that those aren't the people who are true role models — not just for kids, but for anyone.

This isn't a judge on their character, nor is it an I-should-have-been-more-mature rant about how 10-year-olds shouldn't worship athletes, but rather strong political figures, successful entrepreneurs or religious personas.

Because, when it comes down to it, I wouldn't believe a word I was saying if I tried taking that stance.

This is mainly just a reflection on the people who really, truly matter in this world, and in our lives.

My friend, Joseph Curtis, or "Joey," just returned home from a year of duty in Iraq, where he made routine transportations in and out of Baghdad and Fallujah, two cities that have seen the height of military combat since the war began. His conveys withstood enemy fire at a regular pace, listened to constant anti-American racial comments and were flat-out unwanted during their entire time there.

While he should only gain from this experience, by enlisting in the Reserves, he put his family, his country — people he didn't even know — before himself.

Like most, he didn't choose to go to Iraq. He was sent there.

He signed up for the Army Reserves so he could financially make his way through college, but that "one weekend a month, two weeks a year" campaign was blown way out of proportion when Bush turned the Middle East into his personal game of "Contra."

Joey didn't have one of those patriotic moments that some soldiers have: wanting to fight for American freedom because it was the right thing to do.

What he did do, though, was fulfill an obligation he had to the American government.

I respect that, and I honestly believe it is a privilege to know him.

He gave up his days of throwing couches into dorm elevators and tossing chairs into fires during riots at the University of New Hampshire — where we both went to school for three semesters — and learned how to use a machine gun, protect the lives of everyone he fought with and for, and began to understand a level of respect none of us who haven't served could quite imagine.

I am proud of him.

Because while he could have been one of the many who decide that life is too tough and done nothing about it, he did a lot to make sure everything kept moving forward.

While he should only gain from this experience, by enlisting in the Reserves, he put his family, his country — people he didn't even know — before himself.

And that takes more courage than most of us are born with or could even — for one single second — dream of having.

I absolutely envy that.

Because of his tour of duty, he was forced to "celebrate" his 21st birthday in an Iraqi desert in the midst of sandstorms and mortar showers while every single one of his friends transformed from being under-aged to a regular college bar-hopper.

I remember a day last spring when I complained about it being too cold, and I talked to him later on Instant Messenger, only to hear him relay a story of an attack he withstood the night before when he lost one of his friends to a fatal gunshot from an Iraqi nationalist.

I remember complaining another time about how humid it was outside, and he told me he couldn't stay unprotected in the Iraqi sun because the heat was so strong that it acted more like a brick oven than a tanning bed.

Joey got a two-week leave period last September, and he came back a very different person — not too different — but his maturity skyrocketed, and his demeanor was as strong as ever.

Our friendship hasn't changed since we both departed from UNH, but when he left for boot camp, we were two young college kids trying to make our way through life.

Now, he has returned to New Hampshire as a war hero with life experience you couldn't pay a college tuition to obtain.

That is Joey's story.

And I feel proud and honored that I can tell it.

Not so nuanced after all

Ben Duffy

Words have a way of coming in and out of vogue the same way that clothing can. After following politics for a while, I've noticed that there is usually a "word of the year." The word of the year for 2004 was "nuanced."

Democrats have a more "nuanced" understanding of world issues, we were told. Those Republicans lack any real understanding of the complexities of the geopolitics. All they understand is flag-waving and aggression. We should leave the business of running the nation to the smart kids, the Democrats, with their "nuanced" approach.

They must be joking, right? The Democrats grounded their 2004 campaign on useless and inaccurate catchphrases. "Bush lied, kids died" was probably their favorite. Others include "Bush is stupid," and "Where's the WMD?"

Trying to talk to liberals about any of these knee-jerk catchphrases reveals that they don't have a nuanced bone in their collective body. Complexity is not their strong suit.

Let's talk about the liberals' favorite gotcha line, "Where's the WMD?" WMD were just one of several legitimate reasons for going to war. The Congressional resolution granting the President the authority for war listed 23 clauses, and 14 had nothing to do with WMD whatsoever. Only two actually mentioned weapons stockpiles. The other seven "WMD clauses" referred to WMD in the context of Saddam's refusal to comply with UN resolutions.

The Congressional resolution granting the President the authority for war listed 23 clauses, and 14 had nothing to do with WMD whatsoever. Only two actually mentioned weapons stockpiles.

But if the libs were truly "nuanced," they might understand that this war was not about WMD. Instead, it was about Saddam's 12 year history of obstructing weapons inspectors. It wasn't WMD, but the enforcement of UN Resolutions prohibiting WMD. Think that's splitting hairs? It isn't. It's an important distinction, and something anyone with a sense of "nuance" should understand.

After the 1991 Gulf War, Saddam Hussein agreed to the terms of surrender spelled out in UN Resolutions 687 and 689. Iraq was prohibited WMD and long-range missiles. UNSCOM, a UN entity, was appointed to enforce the provisions of the surrender. It uncovered 690 tons of chemical agents, 48 missiles and 50 warheads. The Iraqi government obstructed UNSCOM on several occasions, but UNSCOM was generally diligent and thorough in its duties. It was so diligent, in fact, that Saddam ejected UNSCOM from Iraq in 1998.

UN weapons inspectors would not return until 2002, and only as an effect of US military pressure.

This second team of weapons inspectors was Hans Blix's UNMOVIC. Blix admitted that he was never given unconditional access to all sites in Iraq. Saddam still wouldn't come clean.

In October 2002, Bush appealed to Congress for the authority to act against Iraq, if necessary. He laid out his reasons in the 23 aforementioned clauses. A majority of both parties granted it to him.

His next step was to appeal to the UN. In November 2002, the UN Security Council approved Resolution 1441 by a vote of 15 to zero. It was the seventeenth resolution passed, all of which demanded essentially the same thing: that Saddam allow weapons inspectors to confirm his disarmament. After the sixteenth time of asking nicely, the UN finally threatened "dire consequences" if Saddam did not comply.

Saddam defied Resolution 1441. He failed to heed his "final warning," and the hour came to put up or shut up. The US decided to put up. A league of resistant nations begged for another resolution. They said that they weren't sure that the US had an airtight case. Despite approving the "dire consequences" threatened in UN 1441, they still remained indecisive.

Colin Powell went to the UN to persuade the non-believers. It was silly, not to mention backwards. It wasn't Colin Powell's responsibility to prove that Iraq possessed WMD; it was Saddam's job to prove that he didn't. And after twelve years, two weapons inspections teams, 16 "just-kidding" resolutions, and one "last ditch effort" resolution, there was every reason to believe that Saddam Hussein did indeed possess WMD.

It didn't even matter. If Saddam was allowed to get away with it this time, third world dictators across the globe would view the UN with contempt.

The Iraqi UN delegation swore that they had disarmed, expecting the world to accept Saddam's "scout's honor" as their only evidence. That was sufficient for France, a veto-wielding member of the security council, which decided that it would not authorize force under any circumstances. France gave itself a pat on the back for its "commitment to peace." France showed absolutely no commitment to UN Resolution 1441, which it had approved only two months before.

Don't be fooled. There was no commitment to peace; there was a shirking of responsibility and a commitment to allowing Saddam to act with impunity. Since the unfolding of the UN Oil-for-food scandal, we now know just how much the French had to lose if Saddam fell.

The US worked with the UN, and the UN failed to enforce its seventeenth and "final" resolution. And what were we supposed to do then? Walk away, leaving this dangerous situation unresolved?

If you're a liberal, you'd probably answer yes. That would have been "peace."

But we didn't walk away. The US, UK, and 47 other nations refused to back down. In March, after all other options had been exhausted, the coalition invaded Iraq. After several months of not finding WMD's, the rally cry of the Left became "Where are the WMD's?"

The US and its allies did what they had to do. Ever since that day, we have been ridiculed by cowardly and corrupt nations who flinched when it was time to take action.

That is the "nuanced" answer to the question "where are the WMD's?" So please, if you enjoy being obtuse, continue with the stupid catchphrases. But if you like "nuance," then open your eyes. With or without WMD's, this war is justified.

Blurring the lines of baseball

Katlyn Harding

We might as well have been naked with big red targets painted on our bodies. There we were, in enemy territory, drowning in a sea of navy blue, white and pinstripes. Walking into Yankee Stadium on Opening Day wearing Red Sox gear from head to toe is an invitation for harassment. But surprisingly, both the Yankee and Sox fans threw us a Wakefield knuckleball that not even Doug Mirabelli could have anticipated.

Earlier that day, my friends and I decided to walk around Times Square, decked out in all the Red Sox apparel we own. Yup, we were those obnoxious Sox fans that New Yorkers love to hate. To make a long story short, while eating lunch in the window of a café, a man came up to the window and beat his fist on it. Expecting to see angry Yankee fans, instead we looked up to see him open his jacket to reveal a Boston Red Sox 2004 World Champion T-Shirt. He smiled and gave us the thumbs up, and we returned it, as if we were old buddies sharing a joke that only we knew.

This type of inside-joke carried on all the way to Yankee Stadium. While walking through the treacherous bleachers and swarms of Yankee fans, occasionally we would hear a "Go Red Sox" whisper, the voice then disappearing as fast as Pedro's loyalty to the Dirty Water. We finally pushed our way through the enemy to our seats. Surprisingly, we were surrounded by a substantial amount of Red Sox fans, which gave us a level of comfort that we did not think possible in our situation.

As the game started, the people around us began to adjust into their mindsets for the game. This included very inebriated Red Sox fans around us, and very inebriated Yankee fans everywhere else. This was a recipe for disaster, and my friends and I were smack in the middle of it.

Surprisingly, both the Yankee and Sox fans threw us a Wakefield knuckleball that not even Doug Mirabelli could have anticipated.

The enemy fans tried valiantly to start a "Let's Go Yankees" cheer for the whole game, and offered many different expletives to us, none to which we had any intention of doing. After too many innings of hearing the same, tired cheers from these bad-mouthing fans, their comrades had heard enough. Throwing pieces of pretzel, or whatever food was available, I dare say that Yankee fans began harassing their own kind, their own blood.

A couple rows down from us, some of my friends from UMass were also in the bleachers. Right next to them, a Red Sox fan was trying to enjoy the game. Throughout the entire game, a fan behind this man harassed him with all the Yankee that he had in him. Which must have been quite a lot, because the Red Sox fan got so fed up with the snide comments, he turned around and head-butted the Yankee fan in the face. Blood began pouring down, while the Red Sox fan laid on a couple of punches, for good measure. Call it a lack of concern, but no police arrived to break up the fight. When the Red Sox fan decided the Yankee fan had enough, he left the game, without being handcuffed first.

I understand the rivalry between Red Sox and Yankee fans. I love the Red Sox, but this type of incident is what ruins the game for everyone. We got harassed as well, but you didn't see any of us turn around and beat the stripes off a Yankee fan. Red Sox fans are better than that, we should know better than to resort to blows. Let the dirty aspect of baseball stick with the stadium the Yankees call home.

My friends and I survived Yankee Stadium, and upon departure, I realized that it was not what I thought it was going to be at all. Although their players sometimes act dirty, their fans do not necessarily represent this stigma. And even though Fenway Park is much more of a friendly ballpark, that doesn't mean our fans always follow suit.

Before you think that I am selling out my home team, hold on. After watching the ceremony and baseball game on Monday, it was evident that the entire city of Boston was celebrating a win for the ages, while the Yankees sheepishly looked on. They were experiencing what baseball really is about. Even Mariano Rivera tipped his hat and smiled when our Red Sox fans gave him a hearty applause (for his performance in the first series at Yankee Stadium) because he knows it's all part of the game. And that Red Sox fans are the best baseball fans in the nation.

Easing the transfer

Mike Anmuth

When students come to college for the first semester of their freshman year, they are given many opportunities to get integrated and acquainted with their new college. Here at the University of Massachusetts, some of these opportunities are events like the Club Fair and the First Week activities in, appropriately, the first week of the fall semester. These getting-to-know-you activities are crucial as men and women make the transition from high school and the in-between summer into college, the next scheme of their lives. Still, as many activities and opportunities as freshman receive, a distinct group of new students are often left out of the picture, transfer students.

I realize that there is a distinct difference between freshmen and transfer students, the biggest of which is the going to college for the first time versus leaving one college to pursue another. Students who have attended college previously are surely acquainted with college life, whether they are coming from a community or junior college or perhaps leaving one four-year institution for another. Acquaintance with college life, however, does not guarantee that one will be instantly acquainted with life at their new college, or that their experiences will instantly transfer from one area to another.

With a transfer student organization, like many other RSOs here on campus, the university would not seem like such a daunting and inaccessible place but rather a smaller, tight-knit community.

What is needed on this campus and other campuses that accept students for transfer is a transfer student organization, an extracurricular organization that is designed with the purpose of getting transfers crucial information about the college, providing hints and tips that may not have been addressed at the brief transfer orientation, and mostly, acting as a social network for transfers to get to know one-another. This is crucial in places like UMass where juniors and seniors are not guaranteed housing on campus, especially if transfer students are coming from community colleges where they already have two years of credits under their belts. I am not saying that the current system of handling transfer students is inadequate; I think the transfer orientation is very worthwhile. However, I believe that there are areas of knowledge that could be expanded for these students with the help of a student organization designed specifically for that purpose.

I attempt to speak from experience and this issue was highly relevant to me in the fall when I transferred into this university. I fully encourage everyone to get involved with this campus in whichever way works best for you, whether it's by joining extracurricular clubs and organizations, going to sporting events, or by the many other ways which I have addressed time and time again in these columns. It is both desirable and enjoyable to be involved with your university, to be able to call it home in both a literal and a figurative sense, and I feel this is especially critical for transfer students who may not have had the integration provided for freshman, such as participation in a residence hall RAP program.

Transfer students are welcomed to this university wholeheartedly, offered a brief orientation and then expected to assimilate quickly in their semester of entrance. While many people do achieve this goal rather quickly, either through the methods I listed above or by networking in the residence halls, to some transfers it is a lofty goal. I continue my proposition of a transfer student organization by simply stating that with a transfer student organization, like many other RSOs here on campus, the university would not seem like such a daunting and inaccessible place but rather a smaller, tight-knit community. In order for all of our students to feel comfortable, whether they are freshmen or transfers, policies and procedures must be instituted to provide for their entrance and acclimation to this campus.

Every week I offer an opinion on different topics, some of them containing more grandeur than others, some of which I have very strong feelings and some of which I write because I believe it is an issue which needs addressing. As a transfer student to UMass, I have experienced first hand the issues of which I'm speaking in this article, and I have wished for such an organization that I have proposed.

Working with students and faculty, I believe that we can establish an organization to make transfer students feel at home and create a welcoming atmosphere for new students of all levels, and make this university feel like home to both those new to college and those who wish to finish their degree here at the University of Massachusetts.

STEREOPHONICS

TURN UP THE VOLUME

'LANGUAGE, SEX, VIOLENCE, OTHER?' PROVES TO BE A BRILLIANT MIX OF OLD AND NEW

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

The first lyrics of "Superman," the opening song on UK rockers Stereophonic's new album "Language, Sex, Violence, Other?" are "you don't know what it's been like meeting someone like you" and judging from the fuzzed-out bass and jagged bursts of electric guitar that permeate the song it's quite obvious that singer/guitarist Kelly Jones has undergone some sort of drastic change. In 2003 the band released their fourth album, "You Gotta Go There To Come Back," and while the album was immensely successful in Europe it failed to catch on in the US as the band had hoped. The band parted ways with drummer and founding member Stuart Cable not long after the album's release. While "You Gotta Go There ..." was a more experimental and expansive album and, while there were some rockers it, the band's previous album "Just Enough Education to Perform," were most notable for the strong presence of acoustic guitar.

But Jones and remaining founding member, bassist Richard Jones, realized this time out that they had to plug in and turn the volume up. While "Superman" is a brooding, mood-setting opener the album that takes a sharp turn into "Doorman" a frenetic fast-paced rocker, which finds Jones yells for a rude security guard to "suck my banana". Despite seas of adoring fans and spending the past few years under stadium lights it seems Jones is pretty angry.

"Language, Sex Violence, Other" isn't either a complete departure nor is it quite the return to the band's stomp-rock roots that they promised. Rather it's somewhere in between and that's what makes the album shine. "Brother" is a driving, pounding arena-rocker that is carried by Jones' trademark gravel voice and "Pedalpusher" barrels pumps adrenaline through the speakers, and there's something about "Deadhead" that creates a simultaneous feeling of getting beaten to the ground and winning the fight of your life.

The album, despite its loud nature, succeeds in the atmospherics that "Just Enough Education to Perform" had to quiet down to show off. In every song the guitars seem to cut right through the track and Jones' voice has a very subtle, haunting tone that threatens to drone but always snaps right back. Look no further then "Devil" a song that goes from a nearly scary verse riff into an explosive chorus. There is a subtle hint of new wave in the colors that float all over the album. No two songs sound the same but "LSVO" is a cohesive, well-constructed album that almost feels like one piece.

Even the album's slower tracks, such as the first single "Dakota" and "Rewind" stay all-electric which makes for a very strong dynamic. "Rewind" rides over U2 guitars and "Dakota" is full of boarder-line sappy lyrics (the chorus is "you made me feel like the one") but, in true Stereophonic's form it's pulled off with a charm and an inherent cool that just makes you want to play the song over and over again ("Dakota" is especially addictive).

The Stereophonics
'Language, Sex, Violence, Other?'
V2 Records

While the album has already had great, and expected, success in UK and no doubt old fans of the band will love this album. However now the time comes for the band to anxiously watch how it performs in the US. "You Gotta Go There..." had some minor success but the band seemed to disappear back into the studio, practically disowning the record (Jones claims they were too stoned when they made it), before it really caught on. And perhaps that was for the best. While most fans would disagree with the dismissal of "You Gotta Go There...", "LSVO" certainly is a more complete, if not superior, work. It is almost upsetting to see how much the band cares about American acknowledgement, though fortunately it hasn't started to affect their writing. While the Stereophonics certainly deserve success in the US like they've had overseas they should be able to sleep at night knowing that they've, yet again, made a great album. Stereophonics aren't nearly the most experimental rock band around but perhaps American rock radio hasn't caught on because the band is beyond the mindless, soulless, derivative rock that pervades the airwaves. That being said anyone that's looking for a loud, intense, and sincere (without being overly earnest) rock album that is outside the radio-rock formula would best make do to seek out "Language, Sex, Violence, Other."

Pearl Street offers a listen to M. Ward's 'Transistor Radio'

By Ian Jones
Collegian Correspondent

Many people are familiar with M. Ward for his appearances supporting Bright Eyes on tour, but beyond their roots music inspirations, Conor Oberst and Matt Ward are not all that similar. The collaboration makes sense, though. Ward is much like Conor at his folksiest and catchiest, but his voice is lower and more pleasant. Where Oberst is whiny at times and always high-pitched, Ward is bluesy and scratchy; he sounds as if he's spent years singing his heart out in smoky clubs.

M. Ward
Pearl Street Northampton Tonight

After the breakup of his band, Rodriguez, the Portland, Oregon-born M. Ward wrote his first album, "Duet for Guitars #2." It was released by Howe Gelb of Giant Sand on his Ow Om Records, and that and his sophomore album, "End of Amnesia," attracted the attention of legendary indie rockers Superchunk, who released his third record, "Transfiguration of Vincent," on their Merge Records.

Ward's soft, scratchy voice provides an excellent foreground for his understated guitar work behind. It is gravely and bluesy, while at the same time light and dreamy, and it works well with Ward's blend of American folk music and Brian Wilson-pop. His acoustic guitar work is complex and expertly applied, but never flashy, even on instrumental tracks. Instead, it forms a background for well-written compositions that showcase Ward's songwriting abilities.

On his latest album, "Transistor Radio," M. Ward collaborates with Jim James of My Morning Jacket, Jenny Lewis of Rilo Kiley, Vic Chesnutt, Howe Gelb, and Rachel Blumberg of the Decemberists and Norfolk & Western, who are supporting him on this tour. The album is a tribute to radio during it's golden age, and Ward appropriately opens it with an instrumental cover of the Beach Boy's "You Still Believe in Me," a strange and dreamy mixture of folk guitar and pop that lets you know what you're in for. Ward's voice is the star of the album, though, and he leads the listener on a journey through radio nostalgia. The album's vintage feel could get irritating, but Ward is able to pull it off, and his sincere lyrics are tempered with just enough dry wit to make the smile on your face as you listen a bit bigger. The songs all look deeply at 50s, 60s and 70s pop rock, and Ward pulls what he wants out of each and makes it his own. "Radio" concludes with another instrumental rendition of a familiar song, this time Johann Sebastian Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier." The mood is similar to the first track's, and again highlights Ward's ability to take something old and make it entirely his own, coming off as sincere the whole time.

With each album, Ward gains more respect and popularity from musicians and music fans alike, both for his talents as a songwriter and guitarist, and his unique voice. It's nearly impossible to listen to one of his albums without becoming a fan, and if he continues releasing records this good, he's bound to be big.

M. Ward will be playing at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton on tonight at 8:30 PM in the Ballroom. Tickets are $15 at the door.

'The Wu-Tang Manual' brings the RZA to local bookshelves

"The Wu-Tang Clan Manual Enter the 36 Chambers Volume One," was compiled by group member The RZA. Spanning across four books, the "Manual" contains the group's biographies, philosophies, and songs.

By Lori Bartlett
The Oracle

TAMPA, Fla. — Before Ol' Dirty Bastard's untimely demise, he was famous for his antics, most notably going onstage at an awards show and accepting an award The Wu-Tang Clan didn't actually receive, and then informing the audience that, "Wu-Tang is for da children." Wu-Tang may not be entirely appropriate for "da children," but it is good for the general audience and has more musical depth than many give it credit for.

No one combines such an eclectic mix of social commentary, philosophy and hard-hitting beats quite like The Wu-Tang Clan. The RZA, aka Bobby Digital, aka The Abbot, compiled a book that gives the world insights into the nine famous hip-hop masters.

"The Wu-Tang Manual: Enter the 36 Chambers, Volume One" is a brief look at all that is Wu-Tang. Book I is a basic listing of the members, their nicknames, histories and skills. Vivid black and white photographs make up the book's primary illustrations.

Book II reveals the Wu-Tang's sources of spirituality, philosophy, martial arts fascination and the importance of chess and cinema. The manual lists spiritual influences as diverse as the Bible to Buddhism. The second book closes with a slang dictionary full of explanations for many Wu-Tang-isms. An example is a "haggler," defined as a bothersome individual or a "bald-headed person who looks like boxing champ 'Marvelous' Marvin Hagler." In Book II the RZA also explains in a section about organized crime why almost every hip-hop star has a Scarface poster.

Using the Wu's definitions as a basis, Book III dissects nine of the Wu's most popular songs. The list includes "C.R.E.A.M." "Bring Da Ruckus" and "Protect Ya Neck." All of the song's lyrics are listed verbatim, and sidebars explain lyrics that may not have an obvious explanation on first listen. In "C.R.E.A.M." the RZA explains that when Inspectah Deck says, "Ready to give up so I seek the Old Earth," he means to get advice from his mother.

The closing installment of Book IV discusses hip-hop and the Wu's place in the community. The art of rhyme, technology and sampling are all techniques the RZA divulges, as well as some of the Wu's preferences.

'The Wu-Tang Manual'
By The RZA
Riverhead Trade

The paperback book looks slick with its silver embossed cover and easy-to-read layouts. Though the book is an easy read, it is relatively packed with information. Not solely for the hip-hop enthusiast, it explores such a wide variety of topics that something is bound to interest an otherwise-uninterested audience. The RZA explains at the beginning of the book that it is not a complete work in any way, but an overview of the important parts of this hip-hop inegagroup. He states to consider it an "accompaniment to the album Enter the Wu- 36 Chambers."

The book details the success of the Wu-Tang members in television and movies. Method Man scored a hit movie called How High with Red Man. The duo also had a short-lived and similarly themed show in 2004 called Method and Red. The RZA and his cousin, the GZA, appeared in the film Coffee and Cigarettes in a scene with Bill Murray, and also made appearances on Chappelle's Show, representing Wu-Tang.

The RZA will likely have continued success with his interesting view of the world and well-articulated methods of expression. The book closes with a few pages entitled "The Saga Continues," in which the RZA encourages readers to seek their own truth and knowledge. Hopefully, the saga will continue for the remaining members of the Wu-Tang Clan and they will keep producing such quality work.

Thinking about purchasing a used car? Ask an attorney first

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q. I just bought a car from another student last week for $1500. The seller told me the car was in good condition. It passed the state inspection, and then I took it to mechanic to look over the car and found out that the engine is not in good shape. At minimum, it needs a valve job I don't have the money for this repair. Can I make the seller pay?

A. When you purchase a car from a dealer, the Used Vehicle Warranty Law requires the dealer to give you a written warranty for 30, 60, or 90 days, depending on the mileage of the car. This warranty requirement is not applicable to private sales, so you have no way to make a private seller liable for repairs. Although you don't have a right to demand a repair, there are several situations where a private buyer can return the car to the seller and demand a refund. The Lemon Aid Law applies to sales by private parties as well as dealers, but you are not eligible to utilize this law because your car passed the state safety inspection. Under this law, if the car fails the state mandated inspection within 7 days of purchase and the cost to repair is estimated at more than 10% of the purchase price, the buyer has a right to return the car for a refund.

There is a provision in the Used Vehicle Warranty Law that could apply to your car, if you can prove that the seller knew about the engine problem and concealed this from you. One possible way to document this is to speak with the mechanic who serviced the car for the seller, if you can find out who this is. In most instances, the seller's knowledge will be very difficult to prove, so the right is rarely exercised successfully.

Your question highlights the importance of carefully checking out the car before buying it. The time and expense will be well worth it. A buyer should not take a seller's word that a car is in good condition, or that any problems noted are minor. It is very important for a buyer to test drive the car, and then check the vehicle history through carfax to make sure that it was not in a major accident and that it was never bought back as a lemon. Then, for any car still under serious consideration, the buyer should hire a trusted independent mechanic to do a pre purchase inspection. Based upon the information from this mechanic, a buyer may be able to negotiate a reduced purchase price, or may decide not to buy the car.

In summary, you have no legal right to make the seller fix the car. In fact, the lack of required warranty is one reason that cars bought by private parties are usually less expensive. However, even though the seller has no legal obligation to pay for the repair, he might agree to share the repair costs with you in order to avoid the time and expense of legal action.

Minutemen travel to take on Statesmen from the national rankings this week, a factor that Cannella tabbed as a clear motivational factor for his opposition.

"This is a very talented team," Cannella said. "That's the first thing we said to our guys, we're going into a hornet's nest. They may have lost three games in a row, but this is an excellent team and a team that will want to get back on top. A win against us will probably do it for them."

After two consecutive lopsided wins at home for the Minutemen — 18-8 over Penn State on April 2 and 14-6 over St. John's on Saturday — they will take the road for the first time in three weeks. UMass' only two losses this season have been away from Garber Field, and they have come in two of its last three trips out of the Pioneer Valley.

Cannella has been concentrating on keeping his squad mentally tough in order to not let that happen again tomorrow.

"We call it 'game Teflon,'" Cannella said. "Like a Teflon pan, things have to bounce off of you whether they're good or bad. You have to be focused for the 60 minutes when you play. If something happens good in the game, great, it's still 0-0, that's how we have to look at it. If it's bad, that's OK, we'll get it back the next time.

"You really have to have that mindset in the game, especially in the game of lacrosse, how fast it is and how quickly you can score...Talking to the guys, nothing in the external, in whether it's the environment, whether it's the field, the fans, whatever it is, we tell them it can't effect you."

Hobart is one of three new teams (St. John's and Loyola) in the ECAC this season, and the two clubs have not faced each other since 1985, before six Minutemen were even alive.

NOTES: The Minutemen announced the signings of seven members of the Class of 2009 yesterday. Joining the team next year will be attackman Timothy Balise (Wilbraham, Mass./Minnechaug Regional H.S.), midfielder Nicholas Glasser (New City, N.Y./Clarkstown H.S.), defenseman Diogo Godoi (Concord, N.H./Bridgton Academy), midfielder Dennis Lynch (Milton, Mass./Milton H.S.), defenseman Brennan Mack (Cortland, N.Y./Cortland H.S.), attackman Nathan Russell (South Hadley, Mass./South Hadley H.S.) and defenseman John Stone (Carlisle, Mass./Trinity Pawling H.S.).

ple to handle the ball like Candice Molinari, or a kid like Lauren Proctor who hits very well for us and hits for her average, and a kid like KJ who will hit it out of the park."

"It's Critical," Sortino said. "What we've been talking about this year, which has been different from other years, is people coming in, pinch hitting, pinch running because they can make a difference."

COURTESY KAREN WINKLER

Junior Kristi Stefanoni and the UMass softball team are looking towards the A-10 championship. Stefanoni a home run on the season.

The pinch hitters in the lineup are made up of sophomore Amanda Acampora, freshman Stacy Cullington, junior Lesley Ferrara and senior Jasmine Edwards. Sophomore Michea Holness has come into the game as a pinch runner in 14 games this season.

On the mound in 2005, it has been the pitching duo of senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa. The team has depended on the two aces, who have won five shutouts this season. LaFogg leads the A-10 in strikeouts with a total of 132 and hold a team-high ERA of 2.09. Her counterpart, Busa, has a season record of 6-4 and has an ERA of 2.65 over a span of 19 appearances. Despite the plethora of runs scored by the Minutewoman offense, Sortino is adamant that without defense, wins will not come.

"As great as offense is, offense comes and goes, defense wins championships," Sortino said. "And consistency and doing things right is going to win a game and win a championship."

With 19 games left in the regular season, the pressure is on for the Minutewomen to add to their season record. Eight A-10 games remain to be played and with 17 straight regular season A-10 championships, the stress is building for the Maroon and White.

"It's important because we have to find a spot, to be one of those four teams come the weekend of May 10th, to be at the Atlantic 10 championship," Sortino said. "That's our doorway to the NCAA tournament. It's a conference game, it's big. I can't say enough about how important these games are."

The Minutewomen currently hold a seven-game winning streak and 77 unbeaten games at home. Play begins this afternoon at the UMass Softball Complex with Game 1 beginning at 3 p.m. against Saint Joseph's.

Recruit will play point guard for UM

Ford, who came to UMass after leading Eastern Kentucky University to the NCAA Tournament, had been recruiting Lowe early on. Once his stock started to rise, Ford began to back off, knowing a bigger program would likely pick him up.

"We recruited him very early at Eastern Kentucky, but then we realized how hot he was getting so we got off of him a little bit," Ford said. "Once we got the job here, we knew this was the level he could play at and we were lucky to get him."

Aside from UMass, Lowe had narrowed down his decision to UTEP, Maryland, Virginia Tech and Fordham. Ford mentioned that he chose to play for the Minutemen based on their immediate need for a point guard, the campus, the Mullins Center and other basketball facilities.

Since Lowe is a true point guard, Ford is still recruiting for guards, but is not heavily recruiting any more true point guards.

"We're looking for guards period, they can be combo-point guard, but not necessarily true point guards," Ford said. "That's what he is, he is a true point guard and can't play anywhere else, but we need a little more depth at those other positions."

One of Lowe's defining moments was shutting down Sebastian Telfair, who was the No. 13 pick by the Portland Trailblazers out of high school in 2004, in the 2004 State Championship game. He held Telfair to 14 points in the 66-52 victory.

Although UMass has used its point guard as a scoring option over the past four seasons, with Anderson scoring over 1,000 points in his career, Ford is pleased with the defender he is getting in Lowe.

"He's an incredible defender, one of the best on the ball defenders. He literally shut down Sebastian Telfair, not many if any players did that in high school," Ford said. "He's not a point guard that is going to go out and score 20 points, but that's not necessarily what we need."

Steroids and MLB

Pirate named Barry Bonds turned into a freak of nature when he arrived in San Francisco, as well as his publicize roid rage on the media. We also saw two guys, Sosa and McGwire, both break a 36-year old homerun record in the same year.

So, we all saw this coming, but why do we continue to give Canseco the satisfaction of making more money off the mistakes of others than he did himself? It's completely absurd.

While others put in extra time in the weight cage or ran the extra mile, these guys just popped a needle in their arms to gain that edge on the competition. Call me corny, but what message does that send to Little Leaguers, or more importantly, high school players across the country? Take this drug or you won't succeed? This is a serious problem Canseco says he wants to fix, but I don't believe that for a second. He just wants the spotlight, the most media attention and the dollar bills.

So, let's do the best possible thing, IGNORE CANSECO. Don't watch his interviews. Don't listen to what he has to say. And most of all, do not, I repeat do not, buy his book. The scandal is evident and will be taken care by the authorities, not Jose Canseco.

Let's not ruin baseball with the mistakes of a few.

"Look, Ross, you gotta understand, between us we haven't had a relationship that has lasted longer than a Mento. You, however have had the love of a woman for four years. Four years of closeness and sharing at the end of which she ripped your heart out, and that is why we don't do it. I don't think that was my point."

UM to be put to test

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

This game may well serve as the biggest springboard for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team all season.

The Minutemen (7-2 2-1 ECAC) travel to Geneva, N.Y. to take on the Hobart Statesmen (5-4 1-2 ECAC) tomorrow at 1 p.m., exactly seven days before they host their biggest obstacle to an ECAC championship in No. 5 Georgetown, and 14 days before the most anticipated game on the schedule, a home dual with annual national powerhouse, No. 6 Syracuse, in the middle of UMass' Spring Weekend.

With one conference loss under UMass' belt, it can ill afford to drop another ECAC matchup, as the Hoyas are still undefeated in conference at 2-0.

Hobart's attack is paced by senior Nate Hill (15 goals, 15 assists, 30 points) and freshman Daryl Veltman, who was just tabbed ECAC Lacrosse League Rookie of the Week following his eight-point performance (four goals, four assists) in a 19-13 loss to Penn State last week. Veltman leads the Statesmen with 18 goals this season and has contributed with 11 helpers.

UMass coach Greg Cannella is concerned with the fast pace the Statesmen will play at, and he is also worried about the matchup problems his team may have with Hobart tomorrow.

"They're very athletic," Cannella said. "They have some tremendous guys with some great skills on offense, and they have a very big and physical defense.

"They'll chase you around defensively. They have some sharpshooters on the offensive end. Nate Hill is as good as we're going to see as an attackman.

Redemption time for UMass

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

On May 14, 2004, the Massachusetts softball team (18-11-1 4-2 Atlantic 10) was stunned twice, falling to both Temple and Saint Joseph's at home. These losses broke the Minutewomen's national record of 73 straight home games and ejected UMass from the 2004 A-10 tournament. This afternoon at 3 p.m. and Sunday at noon, the Maroon and White will have a chance for retribution as they will take on both teams in doubleheaders, playing the Hawks today and the Owls on Sunday. Both games will take place at the UMass Softball Complex.

Since an A-10 doubleheader loss against Fordham on April 4, the Minutewomen have gone on a seven-game win streak, while outscoring their opponents 45-9 runs. The improvement in hitting and the abundance of runs scored is something that UMass coach Elaine Sortino has stressed all season.

"I feel good, the kids have worked hard at hitting," Sortino said. "I think we've worked hard at being disciplined within the frame of putting the ball in play, swinging at good pitches, not just swinging at anything."

On Tuesday, in a contest at UConn that lasted 10 innings, six of the eight Minutewoman starters recorded at least one hit, while four home runs were cranked out in the 7-6 UMass victory. Less than 24 hours later, the Minutewomen swept a doubleheader against Central Connecticut, winning Game 1 with a score of 8-0 and Game 2, 9-1.

The ones that have been amassing the numerous hits include junior KJ Kelley, who has seven home runs on the season and recently broke the all-time career record at UMass with 28 career homers. Sortino is pleased with the contributions from everyone on the team, with each batter chipping in something different.

Ford inks Lowe as first signing

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

It has been less than a month since the Massachusetts men's basketball team named Travis Ford its head coach, and he has already addressed one of the major issues facing the team while naming his first recruit of the off season.

Point guard Chris Lowe, out of perennial powerhouse Mount Vernon High School in New York, signed a National Letter of Intent for UMass on Wednesday, putting a true point guard on a roster lacking depth at the position.

The Minutemen lost captain Anthony Anderson and former-JUCO transfer Chris Chadwick to graduation after this season, leaving a major gap on the depth chart. With only Maurice Maxwell, primarily a swing man, to step up, the signing of Lowe was a welcome addition.

"He's a winner, he's an incredible defender, he tends to make people around him better, he works extremely hard at his game and he's the type of point guard we were looking for," Ford said.

Lowe, who stands at 6-foot and weighs in at 160 pounds, was a two-year starter for coach Bob Cimmino at Mount Vernon. He helped the Knights win the New York State Class AA championship in 2004, compiling a 27-3 record. This season Lowe and the Knights went 20-4, but lost in the championship game.

During this past season Lowe averaged 12.9 points, 6.5 assists, and 4.5 steals per contest. He was named to Westchester County's Section I First Team and a Second Team Journal News All-Star.

Canseco similar to McCarthy

Finally, baseball season has returned. It's time to see the new and old faces of your favorite ball club battle for a chance at the World Series Trophy, but there seems to be a new battle being waged.

A suspicious battle where fingers are being pointed, accusations being made, congressional hearings being held and lawyers receiving phone calls. Has our great American pastime entered a period of darkness and doubt? Have we not learned from history where this will end up?

Welcome to the golden age of steroids.

In most recent headlines, a Southern California writer made accusations about former two-sport superstar Bo Jackson citing that his career-ending hip injury was due to his steroid usage. Though the writer has since apologized for the article, Jackson, who has been out of professional sports since 1994, was willing to release every single blood test he has ever taken. Bo knows touchdowns and homers, but Bo don't know steroids. But why are we attacking one of the greatest athletes of all time's reputation after his career ended tragically by a freak accident over a decade ago? It just doesn't make sense, but that's the era of athletics we live in.

The BALCO and Juiced era has officially made baseball into a mockery of truth, justice and tell-all books. Everyone from the corky Sammy Sosa to the absent-minded Mark McGwire to Viagra spokesman Rafael Palmeiro appeared before the House Government Reform Committee in March to discuss the use of steroids in the majors. Besides Palmeiro's honest approach, McGwire tried to hide the obvious from everyone by pleading the fifth and Sosa all of a sudden was no longer bilingual. More speculations became evident and baseball's good name was dragged through the mud even worse. To think this speculation and demand for the truth all came from a book entitled "Juiced" written by McGwire's Bash Brother in Oakland.

For such serious accusations to be made, a credible source must be present and that credible source is none other than Jose Canseco. No, that's right, Jose Canseco. The same Canseco who put on the worst pitching performance of all time. The same Canseco who dated Madonna in one of those "look at us" Hollywood-type relationships. The same Canseco who made the most embarrassing error of all time by heading a ball over the fence for a homerun. The same Canseco who made himself a laughing stock in baseball towards the end of his career. Trust me, Canseco as a credible news source was a shocker to everyone who witnessed his downfall since his glory days in Oakland.

Canseco, who is an admitted steroid user, is the leading rat, or narc if you will, in the search for steroid-popping cheaters like himself and made himself into a modern-day Joseph McCarthy.

If you forgot your high school history, McCarthy was the Wisconsin senator conducting a "witch hunt" for Communist within the United States and said he had a list of 57 known Communists within the country. Though the list, originally put together by the FBI, had some admitted Communists on the list, the majority had drinking problems or were sexual deviants.

Both Canseco and McCarthy hold a lot in common. Both drove witch hunts inspired by personal inspirations and empty accusations, as McCarthy wanted to be president before being busted and Canseco simply wanted more money. Also, Canseco is obviously trying to make people remember who is he and sells his dirty laundry by selling out all his old teammates in Oakland and Texas.

Another comparison that can be made between Canseco and McCarthy is they love to manipulate the media. Do I think Canseco is lying about the alleged users to create a certain public image of himself? Yes and no. Canseco and McCarthy were not trying to do the "right thing" as they both had publicized in their hunts for justice, but they both used the media to create fear and speculation within the general public to make themselves more well-known and in Jose's case, richer.

The third and final similarity is both men have absolutely no character or sense of decency. Who goes ruining people's lives by accusing of something they may or may not have done without any evidence or proof besides their word? McCarthy was eventually caught up in his lies, lost his honor and developed a serious drinking problem. As for Canseco, Madonna's former boy toy is being sued for $500,000 by two men who claimed Canseco and his twin, Ozzie, beat the crap out of them outside a South Beach night club.

Though Canseco is sad excuse for a human being, let's be honest, you notice how a skinny

WASHINGTON — Players were serenaded with chants of "Lets go, Nats!" at a VIP luncheon seven hours before the game started. Leaders in Congress announced there would be no votes after 5 p.m. so lawmakers and staffers could attend the game. Everyone anticipated President Bush resuming a 95-year-old tradition of throwing out the ceremonial first pitch.

The official return of major league baseball was an all-day party Thursday in the nation's capital. In a city that went 12,250 days, since 1971, without hosting a regular season big-league game, Thursday night's Washington Nationals home opener against the Arizona Diamondbacks was a joyous exclamation point for celebrations that began 6 1/2 months ago with the announcement that the Montreal Expos were heading south.

"I'm numb. I'm raking it all in," said Mickey Vernon, who turns 87 next week and was one of 10 former Washington Senators honored throughout the day. "It's been a long while coming, but for those with patience, something good comes along."

The game wasn't scheduled to start until 7:05 p.m., but the day was jump-started with a $1,500-per-table luncheon hosted by NBC's Tim Russert. The Nationals players, travel-weary after arriving the night before following a nine-game road trip, chuckled and otherwise tolerated endless photo-ops with big-name sponsors before being led into the hall by a high school marching band to the cheers of 1,000 of the city's top businessmen and political figures.

Needless to say, the players never got this kind of treatment in Montreal, where crowds were small and some "home" games were farmed out to Puerto Rico to raise money, but they also looked like a group that couldn't wait for the hype to die down.

"It's a lot of stuff we're not used to," outfielder Brad Wilkerson said. "Montreal seemed so much easier. It's taxing, but I'd rather have it that way than no recognition at all."

There already have been numerous milestone dates in baseball's return to Washington, which had been without a team since the expansion Senators departed for Texas 34 years ago. There was the relocation announcement on Sept. 29, followed by the opening of spring training and the first spring training game in February, an exhibition game against the New York Mets at RFK on April 3, and then the season opener at Philadelphia a day later.

But the last of the welcome-back parties was the biggest. Tickets were for the 46,000-seat RFK Stadium were hard to come by, even for some well-heeled Washingtonians. The game offered natural openings for some friendly Republican-Democrat banter. Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., a New York Yankees fans, noted the Nationals' opponent hailed from the home state of Republican Sen. John McCain.

"And, of course," Lieberman said. "I wouldn't miss a chance to see Sen. McCain's team lose."

Some 95 minutes of pregame ceremonies were scheduled before the game, including the presidential first pitch, a tradition that began exactly 95 years ago to the day when William Howard Taft tossed out a ball before a Senators-Athletics game on April 14, 1910.

Bush, a former part-owner the Texas Rangers, was the 12th president given the honor of throwing out a first pitch in Washington, and the first since Richard Nixon in 1969. After the Senators left, presidents performed the ceremony in other cities; Bush did the honors in St. Louis last year.

The Nationals had the scoreboard ready: The name George W. Bush was written on the scoreboard with the "W" written in curly script, mimicking the design on the Nationals' hats.

"Somebody said, 'How do you describe the presidency?' I said it is a decision-making job. I've got a decision to make today. Do I go with a fastball or do I go with a slider?" President Bush said at a meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors before the game.

Barriers were erected near the stadium, part of the extensive security measures taken before the president's arrival, and all fans were directed through metal detectors.

The Nationals are the last team to play a home game this season, which is probably for the best given the compressed schedule for renovating the stadium. Officials are still trying to figure out how to keep the Nationals' new batting tunnel from flooding.

Perhaps the biggest surprise is that the Nationals arrived as a first-place team, having won two out of three against the Atlanta Braves to improve to 5-4 in the NL East. Washington is playing with much of the same roster that finished last in 2004 in Montreal, although the players are finding they have much greater fan support than they had in Canada.

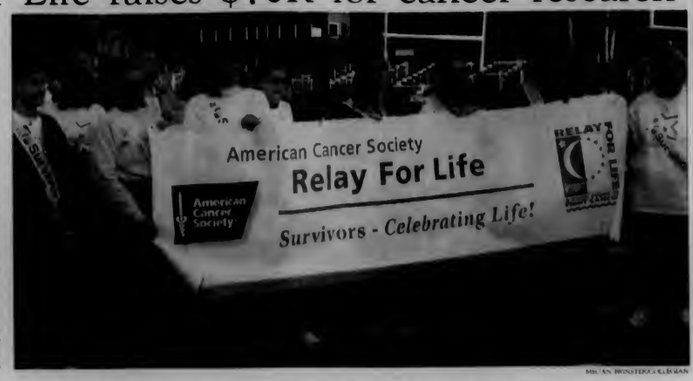
Relay for Life raises $70K for cancer research

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

After nine months of preparations, fund raising and recruiting, this weekend's Relay for Life volunteers raked in nearly $70,000 for the American Cancer Society, nearly doubling last year's totals.

Students from the Five-College area volunteered their efforts, hard work and determination to raise money for cancer research, education, awareness and advocacy. Teams were then created and Friday night, students kicked off the third annual relay — walking around the track at Amherst College for 18 straight hours. The teams collaborated and competed with one another to raise money from local area sponsors, family and friends.



University of Massachusetts seniors and co-chairs of the event Melissa Ivanoski and Nicole Lohr were both anxious and excited to lead the event.

"It's a lot of hard work, but seeing results like these make is worth it," Lohr said.

Last year, the Relay raised $45,000, a goal that was well surpassed by students and sponsors. This year, both Lohr and Ivanoski set a lofty goal of raising $60,000.

Online Chair for the event, Dan Lee said that the majority of the fund raising came from online donations — a newer fund raising strategy that proved to be successful.

"We set up the Web site and we already raised $42,000, with more coming in," Lee said, "Last year we raised $13,000 online. It is the easiest way."

Members of the Amherst community participate in "Relay for Life" Friday night at the Amherst College track. Volunteers walked the track for 18 straight hours and raised over $70,000 for the American Cancer Society, which will go towards cancer research.

Dozens of teams participated in the Relay, all using different strategies to fund raise. Team "Drop it like a W" from UMass copied links from the Relay Web site into their instant messenger profiles.

Team Captain Christine Marchefer said that her team had also raised a large amount of money from family members and some of the team members, like senior Carolyn Markey of UMass got her inspiration from personal experience.

"I bought a purple scarf which is a Relay item and all the money goes to the American Cancer Society," Markey said, "we will be wearing it somehow on us all night."

UMass seniors Kelly Hess said that her reason for relaying is for the good cause of the event and it reminds her of her

Group testifies about high tuition

By Katie Huston
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students and local community members testified about their financial struggles to attain higher education at a public hearing on Wednesday at the UMass Graduate Student Lounge.

The hearing was sponsored in part by the Massachusetts Free Higher Education Campaign (FHE). FHE, a UMass registered student organization, is part of a growing nationwide campaign working for federal funding of tuition and fees for all students admitted to public colleges and universities.

FHE claims it is a response to the national crisis in public education funding. FHE says tuition costs at state colleges and universities are skyrocketing as a result of inadequate financial resources. Members of the hearing also said private, interest-bearing student loans are replacing need-based grants, forcing students to go into debt or forego college altogether.

Massachusetts currently ranks 47th in the nation for per capita spending on higher education. The cost of attendance for in-state students has increased nearly 50 percent in the past five years, from $10,107 in 1999 to $15,197 in 2004-05.

According to the Web site www.freehighered.org, the federal government could fund tuition and fees at all public colleges and universities by rolling back President Bush's proposed estate tax repeal. Tuition and fees at two- and four-year public institutions in 2001 totaled approximately $32 billion; if the federal government eliminated the tax cut for the top 1 percent of earners in America, it would save about $82.4 billion a year, the Web site says. Corporate tax loopholes passed by Congress in 2002 lost $170 billion in corporate taxes in 2003-04, more than enough to fund public education.

Students and community members testified about their difficulties to obtain a college education in the face of these economic obstacles before a hearing board that included State Representative Ben Swan (D-Springfield), Associate Professor of Science Dean Robinson, President of University Staff Association Donna Johnson, United Auto Workers Local 2322 President

RFK Jr. to speak to UMass students

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Attorney, author, and environmental activist, Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. will speak to University of Massachusetts students tonight as a part of the UMass Distinguished Visitors Program.

Kennedy will be speaking his new book titled "Crimes Against Nature." The book's title is a reference to what Kennedy's views of the decisions and actions of George W. Bush during his term as president.

In the new release, Kennedy describes the president's actions as virtually disastrous, concerning the current state of the country's environment. He states that he has feelings of "fury" over the Bush administration environmental policy.

"Texas has long been one of the most polluted states in the country, but rather than remedy the situation, George W. Bush set out to destroy virtually all attempts to clean up the state's tainted air, water, and land," said Kennedy in an excerpt of the book. "Under his watch, Texas had the worst pollution record in the United States."

The book, however, is not the first time that Kennedy has spoke out against the president's environmental policy. In a December 2003 issue of Rolling Stone Magazine that shares the title "Crimes Against Nature," Kennedy says that President Bush "championed a short-term pollution-based prosperity, which enriched his political contributors and corporate cronies by lowering the quality of life for everyone else."

The son of the late Democratic presidential candidate, Robert F. Kennedy senior, continues throughout his book to say that the President is attempting to weaken forest protection laws, and put polluters in charge of agencies that are created in the purpose of protecting the environment.

Kennedy, 51, is a senior attorney with the Natural Resources Defense Council, and chief prosecuting attorney for the Riverkeeper organization. He is also founder and president of the Waterkeeper Alliance, which, according to their Web site "connects and supports local Waterkeeper programs to provide a voice for waterways and their communities worldwide."

Kennedy is also a Clinical Professor and Supervising Attorney at the Pace Environmental Litigation Clinic at

Nursing school enrollment numbers declining nationwide

By Erik Matthew Rothmayr
Collegian Correspondent

Despite efforts by the University of Massachusetts and the federal government, the shortage of nurses is worsening here and across the country and could be five times worse in 15 years.

Undergraduate enrollment in nursing on this campus doubled this academic year compared to last year, according to Eileen Breslin, dean and professor of the UMass School of Nursing. Beginning this year, a class of nurses is graduating every December and May.

"The fact of the matter is we are preparing more nurses now than in the history of our country at UMASS and across the United States," Breslin said.

Under the Nurse Reinvestment Act of 2002, qualified nursing applicants who agree to serve as nurses for at least two years at a health care facility with a critical shortage of nurses are granted scholarships to attend schools of nursing.

The bill helps by "getting behind the nurses who take care of us every day," said US Senator Barbara Mikulski, D-Md. in a Congressional report last July. "It provides incentives to encourage people to enter the nursing profession and make it a career."

Nevertheless, the nursing shortage is now at six percent fewer nurses than needed and is projected to worsen. A report last year on enrollment and graduations in nursing programs says that 15,944 qualified applicants were rejected from entry level baccalaureate nursing programs because of insufficient numbers of faculty, clinical training sites, classroom space, clinical preceptors, and budget constraints, according to a report the American Association of Colleges of Nursing.

According to Dr. Ann Cary, director of long distance learning programs at the UMass School of Nursing, "There is frustration in the faculty of not being able to meet the demand for nursing education."

Thirty-five applicants out of 120 had to be turned away at the school of Nursing, Breslin says, because of the lack of faculty and clinical resources to support them. Between 1995 and 2003, 19,820 fewer students took the official licensing exam for nurses nationwide, according to the National Council of State Boards of Nursing.

Another factor in the shortage is an aging workforce of nurses. A study in the June 14, 2000 Journal of the American Medical Association says that between 1983 and 1998 the average age of working registered nurses increased by 4.5 years to 41.9. It projects that in 10 years, 40 percent of working registered nurses will be 50 years or older. As registered nurses retire, the supply of working registered nurses is projected to be 20 percent below requirements by the year 2020.

According to Cary, "The citizens of Massachusetts need to be concerned about that, it's a risk to patients health to not have enough nurses in a community. It's a community health and public safety issue."

Moreover, the aging baby boomer population will affect the number of nurses needed. Between 1995 and 2010, the number of people in the United States between the ages of 65 and 84 is expected to grow 13 percent, according to the National Center for Policy Analysis. By 2030, about 70 million, or 20 percent, will be 65 or older. Experts project a shortage of health care workers, particularly of registered nurses, by 2020, when the majority of baby boomers reaches the age when most medical attention will be needed.

"This is not on anybody's radar screen. People don't have any nurses to care for them. That's a problem," Breslin said. "The public is going to have to do more self-care, the family is going to have to assume more care. The work of nurses is going to shift because there won't be many of them," she said.

Heinz not running for office

PITTSBURGH (AP) — Chris Heinz, the stepson of U.S. Sen. John Kerry who was widely rumored to be considering a run for Congress, said Monday that he won't seek office in 2006.

The son of the late Sen. John Heinz III had stumped for Kerry during his unsuccessful presidential bid last year, sparking rumors that Heinz would follow that with his own campaign against U.S. Rep. Melissa Hart. Heinz, 32, is the youngest of John Heinz and Teresa Heinz Kerry's three children.

"I'm definitely not doing it in 2006. I've thought about it in my life, but it's just not right at this particular time," Heinz told The Associated Press by phone from New York City, where he lives.

A Yale graduate with a master's degree in business administration from Harvard, Heinz said he is working with some friends in private equity to develop businesses.

"There's just other stuff I want to do," Heinz said.

Heinz said he believes he and his family have moved on since the presidential election, but that he is disappointed in the country's current leadership.

State Democratic chairman T.J. Rooney, who is also a state representative, said he spoke to Heinz after the November election about a possible run. Rooney said Democrats would welcome Heinz if he decides to run in the future.

"Clearly, anytime a candidate that has the potential of a Chris Heinz, anytime they decide this isn't the right year, is disappointing," Rooney said.

During the presidential campaign, the curly, dark-haired Heinz was often compared to John F. Kennedy Jr. in looks and lineage. He was named one of last year's 50 hottest bachelors by People magazine.

Just before last year's presidential election, Heinz registered as a Democrat in the Pittsburgh suburb where his family has a home.

Students experience Taste of UMass 2005

The University of Massachusetts Dining Services held its annual "Taste of UMass 2005" Thursday night in the Mullins Center. The event featured 75 food booths displaying samples of cuisines from around Amherst and the world.

Dishes representing 20 different countries as well as Stop and Shop, Trader Joe's, Big Y and local restaurants were offered. Nathan's Famous Hot Dogs hosted a hot dog eating contest for a grand prize trip to Coney Island for a televised hot dog eating competition.

Entertainment included a magic show, Hawaiian dancers and the Rudy Brown Band.

Internationally known celebrity chef Martin Yan was a featured guest of the event, as well as the New England Patriots cheerleaders, Sam the Minuteman and new UMass basketball coach Travis Ford.

Walk remembers victims of cancer aunt who battled and beat breast cancer and for her grandmother — who lost her life to the disease just one year ago.

"It is hard, because anyone can become a victim of cancer," Markey said.

Before the event kicked off both Lohr and Ivanoski shared their personal reason for relaying that brought a notion severity and motivation to fight the disease. Ivanoski said that she relays for her mother Chrisitne Ivanoski who battled breast cancer and survived.

"[Her battle] was absolutely devastating, but that is why I am here today," Ivanoski said.

Lohr lost her father Thomas Lohr to cancer a few years ago and she emphasized the importance of the event, stating that it is the American Cancer Society's top fund raising event, last year alone raising over $200 million nationwide.

Perhaps the most inspirational part of the event was the lighting of the luminary around the track. Hundreds of candle lit bags lined the track and bleachers either in honor of a cancer survivor or in memory of someone who lost his/her life to the disease. People had written personal stories and anecdotes on the bags that remained lit for the entire night. Additionally, bags were placed and lit on the bleachers spelling out "hope."

"Students especially really enjoyed that luminary lighting," Ivanoski said. "We had a table set up in the Campus Center and so many people wanted to help out."

After the personal introduction eager participants began the walk behind the UMass Honor Guard and cancer survivors, including Christing Ivanoski, a UMass professor and student.

Teams, however, did not have difficulty walking all night, as entertainment was provided throughout the night. Disc Jockeys from the UMass student radio station, WMUA-FM donated their equipment, providing upbeat music and Djing. Also, there was a comedian, gift certificate giveaways and local bands. Dozens of local area restaurants also donated food and beverage to the participants.

"It is such a great feeling knowing that the whole community gets involved," Lohr said, "and it is so awesome to know that everyone here is having such a great time."

Both Lohr and Ivanoski admitted that final totals would not be reached for a few weeks because more donations tend to trickle in after the event, however, they are both overwhelmed by the support of the community and five-college area.

"We are so proud of everyone who got involved," the co-chairs said. "People don't necessarily realize that cancer affects everyone at some level and it is great to know that young people can really make a difference."

Students concerned over tuition

Ron Patenaude, and UMass Student Government Association President Pavel Payano.

Students from single-parent households and low-income backgrounds testified about their families' personal struggles to afford higher education. Other students discussed the challenges of working while going to school.

Melissa Partington shared that her financial situation has affected her competitive eligibility for graduate school because she has no time to participate in other school activities.

"I'm supposed to build a competitive resume, but I'm finding that very difficult to do," said Partington, who works 30 hours a week.

Other students and alumni discussed the difficulties and stress incurred by student loans. Graduate student Jon Zibbell criticized welfare and childcare policies that contradict UMass' supposed commitment to all citizens of the state as a land-grant institution.

"There's a whole war on the poor going on here at UMass," said Zibbell, a single father who struggled through his undergraduate career on welfare and will graduate owing $80,000 in loans.

These conditions are excluding lower-income students, and forcing UMass to recruit wealthier students and out-of-state students who will bring money to the school. Several speakers criticized the resulting lack of diversity at UMass and its detrimental effects on their education.

"UMass has been a failure at providing an environment conducive to learning from all types of individuals," said undergraduate Leta Hlustick, a junior. "We need to stop looking at education as a privilege and start looking at it as a right."

The hearing was the first of several events FHE has planned for the semester to raise awareness across campus and across the state.

"What we're doing right now at UMass is educating the student body about the FHE, which is a really big idea that our citizens have the right to demand that our government act responsibly and provide universal access to higher education," said Carrie Sallgren, an FHE member.

FHE is currently working to get endorsements from other UMass RSOs, to organize campaigns at other public colleges and universities in Massachusetts, and to create a grassroots movement that can connect with the nationwide campaign.

The hearing was sponsored by the Massachusetts' Free Higher Education Campaign, the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP), the Community Education Project in Holyoke, the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), the Graduate Student Senate (GSS), Take Back UMass, the ALANA Caucus, and the Associated Students of Massachusetts (ASM).

N. Korea nuclear reactor shutdown worries US officials

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The apparent shutdown of a nuclear reactor in North Korea is raising concerns among Bush administration officials that Pyongyang has finished producing spent fuel rods laced with weapons-grade plutonium.

A U.S. official familiar with the situation said there could be at least two other possibilities, neither of which was troubling: that the reactor had run into mechanical trouble or that North Korea was bluffing to raise anxieties.

In the past, North Korea has claimed to have taken major steps in its pursuit of a nuclear weapons arsenal, but U.S. analysts say only some of those claims are genuine. Even so, North Korea is believed to have already produced at least one atom bomb, and the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia are trying through so-called six-nation talks to negotiate elimination of the nuclear weapons program.

North Korea had agreed to return to the bargaining table last September after a three-month hiatus but since then has refused to resume the talks.

Reflecting growing impatience, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the administration would consult with its partners about taking the issue to the U.N. Security Council if the talks remain sidetracked.

"That's one possibility," McClellan said. "If they refuse to come back to the talks, then we will have to consult with our partners and look at the next steps," he said, without offering any timetable for action.

At the State Department, spokesman Richard Boucher said: "They need to come back to talks if they are going to solve their problems, and that's where our focus remains."

Responding to North Korea's persistent call for direct talks with the United States, Boucher said, "We are willing to go back to the talks without preconditions" and the United States had a "direct dialogue" with North Korea in past rounds.

The shutdown of the reactor in North Korea's main nuclear complex at Yongbyon was detected by what U.S. analysts refer to as "overhead imagery," which could involve spy satellites.

The idea is to look for cessation of smoke or for significant changes in the readings of thermal or radar counts, said a U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"This is entirely feasible, but for us to know for sure, we'd have to be physically there ourselves and this is no longer the case," said Melissa Fleming, a spokeswoman for the International Atomic Energy Agency.

She confirmed that the reactor would have to be shut down for the fuel rods to be extracted.

In Seoul, meanwhile, Kim Sook, director-general of North American affairs at South Korea's Foreign Ministry, told KBS Radio that a shutdown of a nuclear reactor at the Yongbyon complex had been confirmed.

Yongbyon houses a 5-megawatt reactor that generates spent fuel rods laced with plutonium, but they must be removed and reprocessed to extract the plutonium for use in an atomic weapon. They can be removed only if the reactor has been shut down.

North Korea restarted the reactor after expelling U.N. monitors at the end of 2002.

"We have to wait and see the intentions and the measures North Korea takes in the future," Kim said.

North Korea's persistent refusal to resume negotiations has provoked behind-the-scenes quibbling among the United States and its partners over bargaining tactics.

But there is a consensus on offering North Korea economic incentives and international acceptance if it would agree to stop developing nuclear weapons.

A U.S. scholar who recently visited North Korea said earlier this month that officials there told him they were preparing to unload fuel rods from the Yongbyon reactor during the next two months, adding to the urgency of resuming nuclear talks.

"They will have more plutonium unless there is a freeze," Selig Harrison, a Washington-based researcher, told reporters in Beijing after his trip.

Washington, D.C. man is named teacher of the year

WASHINGTON — At 31, Jason Kamras has figured out the best way to turn his math students into relentless learners is to never stop being one himself.

"I'm always looking at my lessons, looking at my approach in the classroom, stepping back and saying, 'What works? What didn't work? Who can I talk to?'" Kamras said. "That constant process of pushing the goal posts down the field has made me be a better teacher."

The nation's best, in fact. Kamras, an eight-year instructor at John Philip Sousa Middle School in Washington, was named Tuesday as the 2005 Teacher of the Year.

The title turns Kamras into a roving ambassador for his profession for one year, and his main message is one of equity — meaning more money and help for schools in poorer areas. He wants to rally support, starting with President Bush, whom he is scheduled to meet at a White House ceremony Wednesday honoring Kamras and all the state teachers of the year.

"The collective voice of teachers can be very powerful," Kamras said. "If we advocate for our children and demand resources that we know they need, we can have a great impact. We need to tell our stories and let the public know the challenges our children face."

Kamras is the 55th teacher to win the award and the first from the District of Columbia.

He is credited with reshaping the math curriculum at his school by using technology, adapting lessons to different learning styles and giving classes a real-world context.

A photography fan, Kamras has also created a program that teaches students how to use digital cameras, edit images and create photo essays about their lives and their communities. The students visit diverse areas of the nation's capital and exhibit their projects.

Kamras, who has a bachelor's degree from Princeton University and a master's degree from Harvard University, has taught math and social studies in his years at Sousa Middle School.

A committee of representatives from 14 national education groups chose Kamras from among the state teachers of the year, who were nominated by students, teachers and administrators.

The winning teacher is selected based on abilities to inspire students, earn the respect of parents and colleagues, serve as a community leader and withstand a demanding schedule.

The National Teacher of the Year Program, a project of the Council of Chief State School Officers, is sponsored by ING and Scholastic, Inc.

White House critical of Israel's delay in Gaza Strip

By Mark Lavie
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Monday he favors a three-week delay in Israel's planned pullout from the Gaza Strip and four West Bank settlements this summer, ostensibly because of a Jewish mourning period marking the destruction of the biblical temples.

A postponement could give the ill-prepared government more room to plan for the withdrawal, but would also give Jewish extremists more time to organize resistance.

"I'm positively inclined toward this. We simply have to make it as easy as possible," Sharon said told reporters during a train ride Monday.

Israel, meanwhile, announced plans to build 50 more homes in a West Bank settlement — a week after President Bush said such construction should stop.

The White House was critical. "Israel should not be expanding settlements and the Palestinian leaders need to act to dismantle terrorist organizations," spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, left, sits with President George W. Bush at the White House in May 2002.

Yonatan Bassi, head of the administration handling evacuation of the settlers, suggested at a Sunday Cabinet meeting that the beginning of the pullout from Palestinian territories be put off from late July to mid-August. He noted the three-week mourning period many Jews observe before the day that marks the destruction of the biblical temples — Tisha B'Av, which falls this year on Aug. 14.

Bassi, an observant Jew, raised the issue after "an internal struggle and talking to rabbis," said his spokesman, Haim Altman.

Sharon said he would put the proposed delay to a vote at a Tuesday meeting of a Cabinet committee appointed to oversee the withdrawal. Without citing any sources, Israel TV said Sharon had decided to delay the pullout.

Sharon aide Asaf Shariv said the government had originally hoped to complete the withdrawal by Sept. 1 — in time for settlers' children to start the education year in new schools.

In the 20 days before Tisha B'Av, observant Jews don't shave, cut their hair, listen to music or get married, but work is permitted. Jewish law does not specifically prohibit moving houses during the mourning period, but some say that would violate the spirit of the three-week observance.

A senior Israeli official, speaking on condition of anonymity, noted Tisha B'Av is associated with many tragedies and expulsions in Jewish history and said there were concerns about adding the Gaza evacuation to the list.

Responding to reports that the government was not prepared for the pullout, the official said the evacuation could go forward as originally planned, but additional time would be helpful.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Gay union opposition flawed

Chris Eckel

I happen to be a Massachusetts resident born in Boston. Such an upbringing certainly has many benefits, such as being born in a cradle of education and making me the rabid supporter of two world-champion teams. However, it also has some serious drawbacks. For one, the rest of the country hates us. If you ask some, we are snobs. I just prefer to think that we're better than other states in some ways, and that we know it. One of these ways, unquestionably in my mind, is that Massachusetts allows for gay marriage.

Full disclosure time: I am a white, Roman Catholic, moderate, straight male. Thus, I may come across as a fairly unlikely advocate of gay marriage; however, I find it entirely detestable that gay marriage is not recognized across the United States.

Many religious leaders seem to be coming out against gay marriage because it goes against the traditional definition of marriage being a "relationship between a male and female." Now, I'm neither a theological scholar nor am I next in line to become the pope. However, I did attend CCD for the whole 10 years, and my father was a Master Catechist, so I feel somewhat qualified to comment on this whole line of reasoning.

So, the arguments against gay marriage are about as reliable as Mariano Rivera. Churches are pushing a particular point while ignoring the overarching themes of the teachings of their spiritual leaders.

As far as I recall, Jesus Christ stood for universal love and tolerance. Remember that whole being crucified thing? One of the last things he asked of his father (you know, God) was that he would forgive those who had betrayed and condemned him. Sounds like a guy who's all for love and acceptance. Doesn't quite sound like a fellow who would condemn two people for loving each other, regardless of their gender. Last time I looked, fellow deities such as Buddha and Brahma also stressed the importance of love and understanding, and they weren't picky about whom they allowed into their circle of acceptance.

Many claim that gay marriage threatens the "family values" of the typical straight nuclear family. All those homosexuals families moving in next door would surely start riots, turn straight children gay and destroy marriages. Turns out, it doesn't seem it has worked out that way. Denmark has allowed for gay marriage since 1989, and believe it or not, is still standing - the gay married couples apparently forgot to bring the Apocalypse back with them from their honeymoons.

To borrow from Shakespeare, nothing "... is rotten in the state of Denmark." Let's bring it closer to home - good old Massachusetts. Surely the state that allows for gay marriage must be a den of moral depravity whose citizens spit on the sanctity of marriage, right?

Actually, that's a bit of a stretch of the truth. In fact, Massachusetts has the lowest rate of divorce for heterosexual couples among any of the 50 states. How about those other states that cry out about the importance of marriage?

The Associated Press, using data from the U.S. Census Bureau, determined that the highest divorce rates are actually found in the Bible Belt. The AP article asserts "The divorce rates in these conservative states are roughly 50 percent above the national average." So much for the importance of holding a family together, y'all.

So, the arguments against gay marriage are about as reliable as Mariano Rivera. Churches are pushing a particular point while ignoring the overarching themes of the teachings of their spiritual leaders. In a world filled with so much hatred, war and moral decay, shouldn't those who preach compassionate understanding accept loving relationships in all their forms? As for those who decry gay marriage as a threat to the stability of American married culture; well, clean up your own closets before you go looking for trouble elsewhere.

I might be too young for it, but I seem to recall studying an era where people clashed over what sort of rights people different from them should have. There was much debate, but in the end, legislation was passed that made all people equal in the eyes of the law. Turns out the Civil Rights Act of 1964 worked out pretty well, huh? Forty years from now, I have no doubts that the era banning gay marriage will be seen as just as shameful as the era of refusing to serve a black man at a lunch counter.

A person is always entitled to his/her opinion, or else editorial columnists like myself wouldn't serve very much of a purpose. I just wonder why people are so intent on restricting their recognition of a beautiful thing to a narrow definition. Don't be afraid to recognize the unique wonder of lifelong ardor as expressed through marriage in all of its forms; the world is lacking love sorely right now. On that note, I'd like to wish happy spring and summer weddings to all of my friends, both gay and straight.

The darker side of terrorism

Yousef Munayyer

We can sit down for hours and attempt to define "terrorism." It is likely that we will not be able to come up with an acceptable definition. If different security organizations in this country cannot agree on one definition, then we are likely to give up before we can figure it out. However, there are certain things we can limit the definition to help clear up the picture.

Anyone who was following the news last week will have likely heard of Eric Rudolph. If you have not, here are the bare bones: Rudolph recently admitted responsibility for the bombings that killed two and injured 120 at the Olympics in Atlanta in 1996. What was his motivation? To show his disapproval and strike back against a government which condoned the killing of children or, as he saw it, abortion.

The media, both print and television, called him a "bomber." Headlines ran about the "Olympic bomber" and how he had confessed to the crime. Then something struck me. I remember being around the television in 1996 when the Olympic Games were dominating the sports world here in the United States. I remember watching the footage after the bombing on television, seeing police cars and police footage. And I also distinctly remember the cunning news anchors telling the world that this Terrorist act is likely the work of Arabs. They were wrong.

Just as they were wrong when the Alfred P. Murrah building in Oklahoma City exploded and the immediate reaction was to blame it on Arab Terrorists. Instead, we later found Timothy McVeigh responsible, a homegrown American, who only recently received a Bronze Star for fighting in the First Gulf War. Yet when the sketches came out and the hunt was on for McVeigh, the attack was called a bombing, "terrorism" was not part of the picture.

This was a crime by a white man that broke the law, it could not be terrorism. His motivation? Revenging against the Government for its stance on gun control. This hit McVeigh the hardest as he watched the Branch Davidian complex in Waco, Texas burn. In his view, the attack that killed 168 and wounded up to 500 others was in defense of the constitution.

Ted Kaczynski sent explosives to people through the mail. Not only was he white, but he received a privileged education attending prestigious schools like Harvard, and eventually earning his PhD. Then one day he was tired of it all, bought some property in rural Montana and began his attacks, which, over a period of nearly two decades, killed several. His motive? Expressed in his 35,000 word manifesto, he hated the direction society was taking, he hated the role technology was playing and he hated leftists whom he claimed were a corrupt "psychological type" (look whose talking). He would later be called the "Unabomber."

So why is it that these criminals are spared the Terrorist label? Were their crimes humane? Absolutely not. Did they not inspire terror? Of course they did. Did they not have some political objective? Yes. So why aren't they called 'Terrorists' and why are their acts not called 'terrorism?'

So why is it that these criminals are spared the Terrorist label? Were their crimes humane? Absolutely not. Did they not inspire terror? Of course they did. Did they not have some political objective? Yes. So why aren't they called "Terrorists" and why are their acts not called "terrorism?"

The answer is rather simple. "Terrorist" is a label reserved for outsiders. It is not something an American can be. Terrorist is the opposite of American. This is the line that the media has been carrying. Eric Rudolph, Timothy McVeigh and Ted Kaczynski, along with many others, prove that "Terrorist" is a name given to those who are different, mainly people who are not American, or in most cases, not white.

When a few Puerto Ricans attacked congress in the 1950s, shooting and injuring innocent people, they were and are to this day labeled Terrorists. Not shooters or freedom fighters (the term many prefer). There are all kinds of other exceptions this black and white system cannot deal with. Because of this, we get cases like Jose Padilla, who has been labeled an enemy combatant, but has not been charged with any crime. We also get cases like Johnny Walker Lind, or the "American Taliban" who moved to Afghanistan before the war began. The system simply cannot deal with these exceptions because there is no real definition for terrorism.

Terrorism, as the media has us believe, is an act committed by evil outsiders, usually they will be bearded or wearing something resembling a towel on their head. If not, they may be in disguise, but you can surely spot them for their darker skin so keep your eyes peeled. If anything here in the U.S.A. blows up, some dark-skinned terrorist is probably responsible, unless we find out otherwise, then it's just a white-skinned bad apple.

Iraq intelligence a success

Mike Sances

Finally, some good news. I hope you will join me in breathing a sigh of relief now that we know that Iraq didn't have any chemical, nuclear or biological weapons. Although the latest report, issued on March 31, is being spun as a "failure" of American Intelligence, we have to remember that if Iraq really did have WMD before we invaded two years ago, then the administration was taking a huge gamble, jeopardizing millions of lives both at home and in the Middle East. This is, quite simply, because the invasion would likely have provoked the use of the very weapons we allegedly sought to defuse. So be thankful they were not, or else we might not be here today.

If Iraq had WMD ready to launch before the war, Hussein would have probably used them. We can't say for sure now, of course, but it should be common sense that a country is much more likely to use its WMD as a means of defense if attacked than if not (what do you think would happen if the U.S. Air Force bombed North Korea tomorrow?). If Iraq did not have WMD ready to launch, then what George Bush called on March 6, 2003 the "single question" — disarmament — was already answered, and thus the invasion not justified on his own grounds.

If Iraq had WMD ready to launch before the war, Hussein would have probably used them.

The language of a "single question" aside, feel free to replace "ready to launch" with "ready to pass to terrorists," and the results are the same.

This was hardly lost on George Tenet, director of the CIA at the time. So upset was Tenet by these obvious conclusions that he decided to publish an Oct. 7, 2003 letter, originally addressed to Senator Bob Graham of Florida, in the New York Times on Oct. 9. Wrote Tenet, "Baghdad for now appears to be drawing a line short of conducting terrorist attacks with conventional or C.B.W. chemical and biological weapons against the United States.

"Should Saddam conclude that a U.S.-led attack could no longer be deterred, he probably would become much less constrained in adopting terrorist actions. Such terrorism might involve conventional means, as with Iraq's unsuccessful attempt at a terrorist offensive in 1991, or C.B.W.

"Saddam might decide that the extreme step of assisting Islamist terrorists in conducting a W.M.D. attack against the United States would be his last chance to exact vengeance by taking a large number of victims with him."

The threat was hardly limited to Iraqi terrorism. For example, on March 3, 2003, then Secretary of Homeland Security Tom Ridge declared it "fairly predictable" that "we can anticipate more noise in the system, more threats, because of a potential invasion." Ridge was only echoing a classified intelligence bulletin issued by the FBI the month before, which, according to the New York Times, warned that a war on Iraq "could unleash acts of anti-American violence by extremists who do not belong to Al Qaeda or other Middle Eastern terrorist groups, but sympathize with their grievances against the United States."

This is but a sampling of the consensus at the time, and since then. In January of this year, the National Intelligence Council, the CIA director's nonpartisan think tank, announced that the war has turned Iraq into one giant terrorist training camp, providing terrorists with "a training ground, a recruitment ground [and] the opportunity for enhancing technical skills," and that "some of the jihadists who are not killed there will, in a sense, go home, wherever home is, and will therefore disperse to various other countries."

In September of 2003, it was revealed that British Prime Minister Tony Blair had been warned before the war by his intelligence service that the invasion would increase the chance of terrorist attacks against his own citizens. There was apparently a brief row in Britain about this, but the Prime Minister survived intact, and is widely expected to be reelected on May 5.

Here at home, there has been an alarming lack of any such controversy. On Friday, Knight Ridder quietly reported that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has elected to stop publishing the State Department's annual report, "Patterns of Global Terrorism," after 20 years. Apparently, that 2004 saw more terrorist attacks than any other year in the report's history — 625, not including attacks on American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan — was a little embarrassing. (The previous record was 175 terrorist attacks in 2003.)

The intelligence community got the important stuff right: the Iraq war has made us less safe, exactly as they predicted. The true failure was one of judgment. And the fact that we aren't all screaming hysterically over this should frighten us more than any suicide bomber ever could.

Letters to the Editor

CLASS BOYCOTT NECESSARY

I will be boycotting my classes on April 21 and I want to encourage all students on campus to do the same. On the first day of Spring Break, Chancellor Lombardi released a proposal to reorganize student affairs.

However, this proposal runs contrary to the needs and wants of nearly all the students, faculty and staff of UMass. Lombardi wants to reorganize all of our organizations, RSOs, advocacy agencies and other student-run programs to be controlled under a new branch in the administration.

The disgusting transgressions of the administration are also affecting our graduate students. The graduate students have been bargaining for a contract for over a year now. The University refuses to give them real wage increases, but moreover wants to make them start paying more for healthcare, and take away their childcare and same sex health care benefits.

So why boycott? What will this change? I pay for my classes too, but my question for you is, how can you not boycott? By not boycotting, you are telling Chancellor Lombardi that you don't care about this University; that you think students can't handle their own affairs and that we are too ignorant to manage our own money. We need to show the administration that we are not the uninformed apathetic student body that they assume we are. We need to show that we cannot continue with an administration that treats us as children and attempts to control our affairs and money.

That is why I'm boycotting. I will be taken seriously. I will not play the role they want me to play anymore. I will be listened to.

BOYCOTT PART OF MOBILIZATION

This Thursday, undergraduate students at UMass Amherst will be boycotting classes to express their opposition to the usurpation of student agencies by the University administration. On the same day, graduate students at UMass will be holding a walkout to protest the abysmal terms offered to them at the bargaining table.

Two weeks ago, over 60,000 students marched through the streets of Montreal disrupting "business as usual," demanding financial assistance for those who could not otherwise afford a college education.

For the past week, 11 campuses of the University of Puerto Rico have been shut down due to a student strike aimed at canceling an anticipated tuition increase.

Last week, students at the University of Missouri set up an alternative learning center in the main quad called "Tent State." This weekiong teach-in was organized and directed by students. Students cancelled classes for that week on account of an unresponsive university administration. Both Rutgers University and UC Santa Cruz are holding similar events this week.

Three weeks ago, graduate students at the University of Michigan went on strike to demand a fairer contract that would guarantee a livable wage.

This week, graduate students at both Columbia University and at Yale University are on strike demanding that the University recognize their collective bargaining and allow them to unionize.

Without any sort of coordination, these diverse student groups from across the continent have called for mass mobilization around issues of student autonomy and rights to a livable wage. This is not merely a matter of "everyone's doing it"; this spontaneous action is in response to a frightening trend that we have all identified: the trend towards privatization of resources, centralization of authority and disregard for the democratic process. I believe this massive display of student power will reach the eyes and ears of those in charge, and that this successful mobilization could prove to be a turning point in this ongoing battle to preserve individual agency.

Don't sit this one out. Come down to the Student Union on Thursday and see what democracy looks like. What you will see are people standing up for their most basic human right: to have some control over the conditions in which they live, work and study. The UMass administration would like us to think that students really have no say in what happens on campus. History has proved them wrong, and Thursday's events will once again do the same.

Pilates isn't all that perfect

By Lisa Liddane
The Orange County Register

As Pilates continues to be one of the most popular exercise formats today, more studies are emerging to examine its benefits. Many longtime practitioners swear by benefits such as flexibility and muscular endurance. Some claim that Pilates can help people lose weight and improve cardiovascular conditioning.

A new but unpublished small study shows that Pilates can enhance muscular endurance, particularly in the abdominals, but may be limited in improving cardiovascular conditioning and helping with weight loss. Michele Olson, a professor at Auburn University in Alabama, presented the study recently at the American College of Sports Medicine Health & Fitness Summit & Exposition in Las Vegas.

The heads-up news: Pilates becomes a better calorie-burning activity only after you've become more proficient. Olson and her team measured the amount of calories burned during beginner, intermediate and advanced Pilates mat workouts for 12 adults. The following findings are a reality check, especially for beginners who count on Pilates for weight loss.

Beginning Pilates was of a low-moderate intensity comparable to active stretching, so it doesn't burn a lot of calories. The intermediate workout was of a moderate intensity level similar to speed walking at 4 to 4.5 mph. The advanced workout was of high-moderate intensity equivalent to basic stepping on a 6-inch platform.

The longer the workout, the more calories burned during intermediate sessions. A 30-minute session at an intermediate level burned 180 calories, and continuing the workout for 15 minutes burned an extra 90 calories.

The good news: Some Pilates mat exercises were better than basic crunches for targeting the abs. The researchers measured abdominal muscle activity during key Pilates mat exercises. Participants performed five Pilates ab exercises, then basic crunches. The researchers found that most of the Pilates exercises challenged the rectus abdominis, the muscle along the middle of abdomen.

The Pilates teaser exercise and roll-up worked out this muscle more than did the crunch. The teaser starts with a lying position and requires one to come up in a seated V-position, extending arms and legs while maintaining balance.

In the roll-up, one starts by lying on the back and extending arms above the head and finishes sitting up with legs and arms extended.

Pilates exercises also are better than the basic crunch in challenging the external obliques, the muscles on either side of the abdomen. The crisscross was especially effective for the external obliques. The crisscross is similar to the abdominal exercise called the bicycle. One places hands behind the head while lying on the floor, then brings the head and torso up while moving the elbow toward opposite knee.

You don't have to be a Pilates student to do these mat exercises. Learn to do them correctly in a private lesson with a well-trained instructor and add them to your routine.

Fitness expert Lisa Liddane supports the theory that Pilates is great for muscle conditioning but is less helpful for cardiovascular conditioning or weight loss. Calorie burning becomes more effective after becoming proficient.

Blackilicious rocks out at Pearl Street

By Nathan Rothstein
Collegian Staff

There is only one thing better than a happy rapper from California. Two happy rappers. Gift of Gab and Lateef The Truth Speaker were at Pearl Street on Wednesday night to bring happiness back to hip-hop.

Who said hip-hop was dying and had lost its fun? Definitely not these guys. When they arrived on stage a little after 10:30, the crowd was highly anticipating the combination of music plus the words that go with it. For almost an hour, DJ Mike Realm had mixed together a nice brand of hip-hop, soul and classic rock to get the dancing juices flowing. Though after spinning for almost an hour, the crowd was losing attention and ready to hear the main act.

Gift of Gab, one half of Blackalicious, stands about six feet tall, and comes from the overweight rapper school of thought. His stage presence is already gigantic before he even says a word, but as soon as he does, his talent comes alive. His mouth moves like a butterfly flapping its wings as he spits rhyme after rhyme. Unlike Twista, his words are more identifiable, and a more enjoyable, smarter listen. Joining him on stage was Lateef the Truth Speaker, who was a pleasant surprise. Not having the same notoriety as his California peer did not stop Lateef from being so confident. The minute he arrived on stage, he was already pumping his fist and blasting words into the microphone. The crowd immediately fed off his energy, letting him and the Gift of Gab guide them through a night of underground, yet still entertaining hip hop.

Whenever hip-hop is being performed, crowd participation is vital to the success of the show. Luckily, both Gab and Lateef knew the proper elements of a hip hop show.

After every two songs, they would tell tales about the road that would lead into perfectly synchronized renditions of their songs. Forty minutes into the show, Gab claimed he was "mic hogging" and allowed the dj and his backup singer to take from stage. Though the crowd would never accuse the main act of hogging anything, it was nice to have some soul in between the rap sandwich.

The crowd appreciated many of the songs, but things did not pick up until Gift of Gab went back to the songs that made him famous. After the interlude, Gab took his Blazing Arrow playlist and exemplified his exquisite talent. The songs off Blackalicious' second studio album are complete musical masterpieces. They include a soulful hook, provided by the back up singer, masterful rap verses, a la Gift of Gab, and impressing dj cuts, also included in the Pearl Street package.

By the end of their set, the crowd would not leave, and the performers had no interest in leaving early. Both Lateef and the Gab looked out in the crowd raising their hands up and down, as the crowd roared more. While they stood smiling, knowing they had done their part, the crowd laughed and cheered, realizing hip-hop was fun again.

'Amityville' creeps you out but isn't great

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

The previews for The Amityville Horror alone should arouse feelings of trepidation. By now we all know the formula for the haunted house horror movie.

The happy family, complete with a few kids, innocence, and some humor thrown in, moves into their dream home. The dream home, of course, has a bad history. And the screenwriter, in this case Scott Kosar, has to figure out a way for them to stay in the house once the evil begins.

The Amityville Horror, directed by Andrew Douglas, begins by showing us Ronald Defeo killing his entire family at the behest of voices and murderous urges. This portion of the film is surprisingly good — very intense and well done. Then comes the stereotypical family. There's George Lutz (Ryan Reynolds) who plays the stepdad to Kathy Lutz's (Melissa George) three children. This is one of those box-set melodramatic families complete with a whining rebellious cynical teenager and the time-honored question of, "Will the kids accept George?" which is never resolved. The two younger kid actors have a go at acting cute and, before long the moviegoer, may feel possessed by some murderous urges of your own.

Once the family moves into the home, the evil begins. As the film progresses, the home that looked like a dream mansion in the beginning gets more and more frightening. Kudos on the choice of the house — very creepy. The music sustains the tension, playing even in the beginning portion of the film as the foreboding backdrop to the happy families innocence.

Ryan Reynolds, from Blade Trinity, is known for his improvised humor, and brings his own brand of comedy to the beginning portion of the film. It's slightly funny and this breathes some life into the standard horror movie beginning.

George gradually becomes possessed as the evil in the house gets to him. Apparently, he's not just possessed, but is going in and out of possession. This is one of the film's main weaknesses. We don't know where the real George ends and where the evil George begins. Most of the time he's so monstrous that we have to feel he's completely possessed and incapable of discovering any decency he has inside. Other times, he shows his true self and we wonder where he's been all this time. It really gets out of control when George drops his head, eyes straight ahead, in classic T-1000 fashion, and goes after his family like Jack Nicholson in The Shining. We feel like saying, "Who is this guy anyway?"

The film is as predictable as horror films get and worst of all there are a lot of lines that fall dead. At one point, a priest who has recently been in the house and been violently attacked by a supernatural preponderance of insects, says to the Kathy in a deadpan voice, "Your house frightens me." And we're like "Ya think?"

Many lines like this are laughable, and the last thing you want in the climax of a horror film is the audience laughing.

The Amityville Horror is creepy, engaging, and has a few good scares, just don't expect anything original. This is standard store-bought horror with brand new packaging and that's about it.

Ryan Reynolds stars in "The Amityville Horror", a re-make of the 1979 classic scream flick. The movie centers around a possessed house where a massacre had taken place earlier.

UMass downs Hobart

UMass turned around and scored five goals before halftime, led by Sean Morris who had two in the period. The Minutemen gave up one goal to the Statesmen during this stretch, as Nate Molinari ended the drought with 7:55 left in the period.

Morris had a career game, finishing with five goals and three assists. The eight points was a career-high for Morris, who is currently in the running for the Tewaaraton Trophy, an award indicating the best lacrosse player in the nation.

"He played a great game and finished his opportunities, which is great to see. He made a couple of great feeds," Cannella said. "I think Sean and the rest of the guys were able to step up to the challenge they faced"

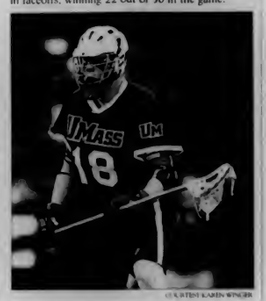
Morris had the last goal of the half, but the Minutemen were unable to capitalize on a man-up opportunity with time dwindling and the game tied at 7-7.

After a timeout, Zywicki settled the ball near the Minutemen's sideline, couldn't set up a play and lost the final possession. As the team's went into the locker room, Cannella screamed at Zywicki as he jogged past.

"I was upset because we were a man up and if you hold onto the ball going into the half you get the possession back and we'd be a man up," Cannella said. "We talked about it in the huddle, we get upset about it because we expect the guys, especially seniors to step up. Jeff is mature enough to come out and not let that affect him and still play well.

Morris mentioned that Cannella was adamant about his team coming out with intensity into the second half.

"He said to us, 'We are not leaving this locker room until you are ready to play.'" Morris said. "When coach says words like that it really gets me going."



Apparently Zywicki was ready to leave the locker room and canceled out his mistake from the end of the half. Zywicki the first goal of the second half less that a minute into the period, giving the Minutemen a 8-7 lead, their second lead of the game.

UMass outscored Hobart 7-5 in the second half, with a strong defensive effort from Jack Reid, who shut down Nate Hill, the Statesman's second leading goal scorer.

Hill has 15 goals and 15 assists on the year for Hobart., but was unable to notch either against Reid and the Minutemen. Hill had six shots on the day, but was never able to get a clear shot on Schell.

"We put Reid on him," Cannella said with a laugh when asked about his game plan to shut down Hill.

The Minutemen were able to chip away at the Statesmen's lead due to cohesion on offense, but lost most of the hustle battles. Hobart had 38 ground balls to UMass' 34, and dominated the Minutemen in faceoffs, winning 22 out of 30 in the game.

UMass defenseman Jack Reid shut down Hobarts' second leading scorer Nate Hill on Saturday.

UMass has confidence in Reid

UMass goalie Bill Schell was able to watch Reid's performance up close throughout the day.

"I don't think he let Nate do what he likes to do, whether it was going right or going left, the moves that he usually pulls off," Schell said. "Jack just shut him down.... If you put Jack on the number-one guy, you don't really worry about it."

Reid has seen his defense improve on an individual level this year, but he credits his teammates for shutting down Hill, too. "I feel really comfortable with my defense, personally, but it really comes down to our unit," Reid said. "Our unit is great. We talk a lot. I've got two other great long poles with me, and we've got Dan Whipple running up top.

"It's just a solid unit, and it's the unit that is getting it done. That's what allows the numbers to be put up that we have. It's not a personal battle, it's just the team defense that's getting it done together."

While shutting down Hill, Reid also found the time to pick up six ground balls and force four turnovers, two of those at the expense of his marked Statesman attacker.

UMass coach Greg Cannella knew his star defenseman would be up to the task of containing Hill, as it has grown to be commonplace this season.

"We told Jack that he was covering him," Cannella said. "We challenged Jack, told him it was one of the best guys you're going to face, and we're going to ask that you do a job on him, be disciplined with him. That was it. Jack did a really good number on him... When we challenge him, he's at his best."

And his opponents are at their worst.

Torra shines in losing effort

Freshmen third basemen Ryan Francoeur went 2-for-2 with both hits coming as a pinch hitter during the eighth inning rally.

Adamski continued a strong weekend with a break-out performance in Sunday's victory by going 3-for-5 with two runs scored and five runs batted in to lead the offensive charge. Adamski also had a game-tying single in the bottom of eighth in game two on Saturday while going 3-for-9 with three RBIs on the day.

"[Adamski] could play better, but I'm pleased to see him finally coming through with the bat," Stone said. "I still think a lot of guys can play better. Not just getting the hits, but by playing good, sound defense."

UMass ace Matt Torra went 10.2 innings as the starter for the first game on Saturday, but still could pull out the win as the Hawks won 4-2.

Torra gave up only three hits and one earned run while striking out a career-high 16 strikeouts. After giving up a single in the second inning, Torra retired 23 consecutive batters before giving up a double in the tenth inning. The Pittsfield native only threw 107 pitches on the day.

"It is frustrating, but everyone is frustrated about the way we played because we lost 11 one-run games," Stone said. "We got to get over the hump somehow, but [Torra] has done a great job. He's definitely pitched well enough to win and then some. We just need to produce more."

Despite a monstrous two-run homerun in the fourth by Jason Twomley, his ninth of the year, the Minutemen could not find a way to beat the Hawks in extra innings. The homerun was Twomley's ninth of the year.

The Minutemen were up 5-3 when senior hurler Keith Doherty was replaced by junior David Sullivan after Doherty loaded the bases. In his first batter faced, Sullivan gave up a grand slam to Hawks third baseman Nick Baldasari. UMass responded with two runs in the bottom of the seventh, but could not respond to the Hawks' run in the eighth, losing 8-7.

Minutewomen turn it around

in order in the bottom of the seventh, as UMass went quietly, save for a solo homer by Stacy Cullington, which resulted in the 11-3 final score.

"I thought our pitchers really struggled in the first game," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "They really weren't able to do what they wanted to do with the ball. That, coupled with four errors, really put our backs against the wall. We hit the ball pretty well, but we hit a lot right at them."

UMass batters were kept off balance all game by Temple pitcher Richelle Villescas. Villescas went the distance for the win, allowing only six hits.

"We didn't really do much other than that first inning," junior catcher KJ Kelley said. "Hitting comes and goes, and sometimes it's not there. We hit the ball but it went right to them."

UMass responded in Game 2, again getting on the board in the first. Puglia led off with a single to right, and Amanda Morin, who extended her hitting streak to 11 games in the second game, followed with a double to left off Villescas. Kelley then connected on her team-leading eighth home run of the season to left-center.

A single by Denise Denis then chased Villescas after only four batters. After Sulick bunted Denis over to second base, Lauren Proctor poked a single to left to score Denis and give UMass a 4-0 advantage.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Junior pitcher Jenna Busa has gone 8-4 on the year for the Minutewomen while sporting a 2.57 ERA with 83 strikeouts.

Temple got a run back off of Busa in the third, but the Minutewomen responded with six runs in their half of the inning. UMass batted around, as the first six batters all reached safely.

The big hit in the inning came off the bat of Lesley Ferrara. Ferrara got the start in the second game in the place of Molinari who left the first game after fouling a ball off her knee, and delivered with a three-run homer to break the game open. The home run was the first of the junior's career.

Busa (8-4, 2.57 ERA) held Temple scoreless in the fourth and fifth innings to complete the 10-1 mercy-rule victory.

Both Sortino and Kelley were encouraged by the improved performance in the second game.

"I was happy because we kept swinging the bats and we had a lot more to show for it," Sortino said. "More importantly, Jenna did a better job on the mound and our defense played better."

"We knew we had to come-back," Kelley said. "We know we have the talent on our team to beat any team in the conference. We knew we just had to step it up so we really took it to them in the second game."

The results on Friday were far more favorable for the Minutewomen, as they pounded out 21 runs on 28 hits in the sweep of St. Joe's (13-17 2-4 A-10).

Things did not get off to a good start for the Minutewomen, however, as LaFogg surrendered two runs in the first inning of the first game, ending a stretch of 23 innings without allowing an earned run at home.

UMass tied the score at two in the third as Kristi Stefanoni singled and scored on Puglia's triple to right. Molinari then slapped a liner to short that was mishandled, allowing Puglia to score.

The Maroon and White scored three more runs in the fifth to take a 5-2 lead. Proctor, the team's leading batter with a .368 average, led off with a single and advanced to second on a wild pitch. Morin then ripped a single off the first baseman's leg. Sarah Hurd, Puglia and Cullington each followed with RBI singles.

LaFogg gave one run back in the fifth, but UMass put the game away with three runs in the sixth. In Game 2, UMass fell behind 1-0 in the second inning, but erased the deficit with a huge third inning, in which UMass sent 14 batters to the plate, collected 10 hits and scored nine runs.

The first 10 batters in the inning reached base safely, with a two-run triple by Proctor and a two-run single by Kelley doing much of the damage.

UMass secured the mercy-rule win with four more runs in the fourth, extending its lead to 13-1.

Busa got the first of her two wins on the weekend, allowing just one unearned run and two hits.

Even though the Minutewomen won three of four this weekend, Sortino sees room for improvement.

"We're very disappointed," Sortino said. "We need to be better so we have a good trip to Boston College."

A Hobart Hoedown

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

GENEVA, N.Y. — The Hobart College lacrosse team gathered in a tight circle on the side of Boswell Field before its game against No. 10 UMass on Saturday. The Statesmen shouted, jumped up and down, then turned around to give the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (8-2 2-1 ECAC) its toughest first quarter of the season.

Hobart (5-5 1-3 ECAC) jumped out to a 5-2 lead in the first stanza, but the Minutemen came back with 12 goals over the next three periods and defeated the Statesmen 14-12, in its third ECAC game of the season.

UMass	14
Hobart	12

UMass returns to action on Saturday to take on No. 5 Georgetown at Garber Field for a 1 p.m. face-off.

Hobart sophomore Chris David put up a hat-trick in the first quarter, with two of the goals coming unassisted. David scored the first goal of the game with 14:03 left, off a hustle play in front of the net, which caught UMass keeper Bill Schell off guard. David would finish with four goals in the game.

Jeff Zywicki answered less than three minutes later, but Statesman Mike Conklin responded soon after. The Minutemen were getting beaten to the ground balls, losing the battle in the first period 10-to-4, which led to several Hobart goals.

"We didn't really change anything, we just told our guys to settle down," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "A couple of those opportunities came off of loose balls and he came in and started to pick at them. We just had to talk, talk through the picks and get organized."

The Statesmen started where they left off at the beginning of the second period, when Conklin received a pass from Daryl Veltman (who scored the last goal of the first period) and beat Schell, putting the score at 6-2.

Sean Morris had five goals and three assists for UMass against Hobart College on Saturday afternoon. Morris' eight points are a career high. Morris also leads the Minutemen in goals with 27, while dishing out a team-high 16 assists.

Reid shines on defense for UM

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

GENEVA, N.Y. — It's hard to imagine that in a game that saw 26 goals, 77 shots, four hat tricks and an eight-point performance from Sean Morris, there was actually a tremendous defensive effort thrown into the mix during the game between the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and Hobart on Saturday.

UMass junior defenseman Jack Reid manned up on Hobart's leading scorer, Nate Hill, and shut him down all afternoon, keeping Hill off the scoring sheet for just the second time this season.

Hill, who entered the day with 15 goals and 15 assists for a team-leading 30 points, was just two points shy of tying Jamie Breslin's career mark of 138 points, the most Division I points in Hobart history.

The senior Statesman will look to add to his 136 career points and break the school record at St. John's on Saturday.

"It was [Hill's] Senior Day, and it was a personal thing," Morris said about Reid's outlook heading into the game. "He needed two points to become the all-time scorer, and all week Jack was taking it personal."

Reid, who usually matches up with the opposition's most dangerous offensive player, has not allowed the man he has guarded to score in four of UMass' last six games.

Hill had recorded at least a goal and an assist in four consecutive games, and had notched a point in his last eight outings.

During his week of preparation for Hill, Reid's scouting routine, which is highly regarded by his teammates and coaching staff, included watching Hill's game tapes and putting them to use on the practice field.

"Me and Brian Iacovina were working with him all week and really preparing him," Morris said after the game. "Jack does the scouting report well and scouts every opponent out of respect, and it doesn't surprise me that he shut him down."

"Nate Hill was a big focus for our defense," Reid said. "We figured he scores about four or five points a game. If we could take some of those points off the board, we'd give ourselves a good chance to be close at the end.

"I focused on him all week. I was watching a lot of video, doing a lot of extra stuff in practice. He was my main focus all week, and I did my best to get the job done."

Mixed results for Minutewomen

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team saw its 82-game home regular season unbeaten streak end on Sunday, but still managed to win three of four games at home against Atlantic 10 foes over the weekend.

UMass (21-12-1 7-3 A-10) opened the weekend with two blowout wins over Saint Joseph's on Friday, winning the first game of the doubleheader 8-3, and taking the second game 13-1.

On Sunday, the Temple Owls visited Amherst and trounced UMass 11-3 in the first of two games. The loss was only the third ever by UMass to an A-10 opponent at the UMass Softball Complex and just the sixth regular season loss since the park opened in 2000. UMass rebounded with a 10-1 win in the second game of the doubleheader.

The Minutewomen's next three games will be on the road, as they travel to Boston College for a single game today at 4 p.m. and then travel to face Saint Bonaventure for a doubleheader on Friday. UMass returns home on Sunday to host a doubleheader against North Carolina State.

UMass appeared to be on its way to extending its season-long nine game winning streak in the first game with Temple, as the Minutewomen struck first.

Hilary Puglia led off the bottom of the first with a homer over the wall in left-center. Candice Molinari followed and was hit by a pitch, and then stole second base. Molinari is perfect on the year on stolen base attempts, and her 25 steals ranks first in the A-10 and 14th in the NCAA.

After Temple got two outs, Pam Sulick hit a double off the left field wall to score Molinari and give UMass a 2-0 lead.

UMass held the lead until the third inning, when Temple scratched together three runs to take the lead. Temple (12-24 1-7 A-10) tacked on three more in the fifth to extend its lead to 6-2, as UMass pitcher Barb LaFogg was uncharacteristically ineffective.

LaFogg (13-8, 2.35 ERA) was plagued by control problems all afternoon as she walked three batters and hit two others. Her lack of control was especially costly because three of the bases on balls came with the bases loaded, forcing in three runs.

Jenna Busa came on to relieve LaFogg in the sixth and struggled as well. Busa allowed one run in the sixth, and left with the bases loaded in the seventh. Busa was charged with five runs (two earned) in only one inning of work.

Freshman Maggie Feix came on to make her collegiate pitching debut with the bases loaded and nobody out. The Owls pushed four more runs across in the inning, all of which were charged to Busa, to give them an 11-2 lead.

A dramatic comeback was not

UMass takes one of three

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

After a pair of close losses on Saturday, the Massachusetts baseball team used a six-run outburst in the eighth inning to win 12-9 on Sunday during the third game of a weekend series with St. Joseph's at Earl Lorden Field.

The Hawks needed extra innings in both games on Saturday to defeat the Minutemen, 4-2 in 11 innings in the first game and 8-7 in eight innings in the second. UMass responded on Sunday by putting up a season-high 12 runs on another season-high with 17 hits in the victory.

The Minutemen are set to play in the annual Beanpot Classic with their first game against Harvard at LeLaucher Field in Lowell, Mass. First pitch is thrown at two p.m.

Holding a 6-1 lead in the top of sixth inning, the Minutemen almost gave away the game with three errors that cost them five unearned runs. St. Joseph's produced a run in the seventh, eighth, and ninth, but the six-run effort in eighth secured the Maroon and White win.

"I'm relieved that the baseball game is finally over and we're ahead," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We made things difficult on ourselves by giving away a 6-1 lead. Jermey Demers pitched a great game, but we got to play better defense, but we finally came through when it mattered and that was good."

UMass jumped out to an early 5-0 lead in the first inning. The first two hitters, junior centerfielder Derrick Durepo and sophomore first baseman Bill Rankin, started the rally with two back-to-back singles. After a balk by St. Joseph's starter Robert Unkel, senior rightfielder Jason Twomley walked to load the bases with no outs.

Following senior leftfielder Curt Szado's sacrifice fly to score Durepo, sophomore third baseman Byran Adamski launched his first career homerun over the left field fence to clear the bases and take the 4-0 lead. Freshman Zach Thomas hit in freshman Brian Garrity for the final run of the rally.

Each team added a run in the fourth to make the score 6-1 before the five unearned runs given up by UMass in sixth.

Stepping up

Freshman Kristen Bakanowski goes for a jump during the Brown Invitational yesterday. Bakanowski came in third place overall while the Minutewomen finished in sixth as a team. The Minutemen also participated in the Brown Invitational and came in sixth place as well.

Crew team takes home Knecht Cup

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

For the second straight year the Massachusetts women's crew team lifted the Knecht Cup, taking the varsity eight race in Saturday and Sunday's Knecht Cup Regatta.

In order to win the cup the Minutewomen had to defeat 27 others schools which included two other Atlantic 10 schools, George Washington and Rhode Island.

"It was a great weekend for us," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "It was very impressive to have three A-10 schools in the final."

The UMass varsity eight checked in with the winning time of 6:43.8. George Washington came in second with a time of 6:50.2 and URI came in sixth, finishing the course in 6:57.4. Also participating in the final were Sacramento State, Gonzaga and Marist.

The boat that captured the cup for the Maroon and White included Ellen Maskrey, Lea Jakobsen, Gabrielle Papineau, Hannah Brewster, Stephanie Hopf, Katie Berger, Faith Harkins and Catherine Garlepy. Kristina Ferraro was the coxswain for the boat.

"The varsity eight is the premiere race in the regatta," Dietz said. "They've bounced back from some disappointing loses to Syracuse and Columbia and hopefully they'll be able to show their speed this weekend [in the A-10 tournament]."

Also picking up victories for UMass were the varsity quad and Jakobsen in the singles.

The varsity quad was able to hold off Kansas and Rhode Island to win the race with a time of 7:54.80.

Jakobsen defeated teammate Garlepy to take the varsity single race. Jakobsen had a time of 9:58.20 while Garlepy checked in at 10:05.50.

Another bright spot for the Minutewomen this past weekend was the varsity four. The boat which consisted of rowers Kristen Boyce, Allie Bahn, Jess Bridge, and Jackie Tuell with Allison Medoff on the coxswain finished fourth. They were able to finish higher than any other A-10 school that entered the race.

The duo of Harkins and Papineau came in second place in the varsity pairs with teammates Melissa Stewart and Tara Guinan came in third place. Harkins and Papineau finished in 9:37.8 while Stewart and Guinan were almost a minute behind at 10:36.60.

All-in-all, Dietz felt that it was a very productive weekend for his team.

"It was good for us to see how we are against other A-10 schools," Dietz said. "The lower boats were able to learn a lot this weekend."

This weekend coming up the Minutewomen are slated to compete in the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship in Camden, New Jersey. The regatta will take place on the same exact course as the Knecht Cup. UMass will be going for its tenth straight A-10 championship.

"Consistency is going to be key for us this weekend," Dietz said. "I hope we can show our speed."

GEO encourages class boycott Thursday

By Mike Sances
Collegian Staff

Tensions between administrators and student leaders escalated this week with plans for a class boycott and student walkout set for Thursday. The joint action, which will also include a teach-in and a barbeque with live music, is being put on by the Graduate Employee Organization, engaged in bitter contract negotiations with the University for over a year now, and the undergraduate group Take Back UMass, who have condemned Chancellor John V. Lombardi's Draft Action Plan, first issued last month.

In addition to several faculty members who support the walk-out, author Barbara Ehrenreich, whose best-selling book "Nickel and Dimed" is required reading for students in the university's Labor Studies department, will be speaking on the Student Union steps at 1:00pm.

Ehrenreich, whose writing focuses on labor issues, has also been published in the New York Times Magazine, the Washington Post Magazine, the Atlantic Monthly, and the Nation.

The Chancellor's proposal, released on the first day of Spring Break last month, was immediately denounced by then Student Government President Eduardo Bustamante, who in an opinion piece in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian called it the latest step in "a longstanding plan by a high-ranking UMass official to usurp the autonomy of the SGA and silence the voice of dissenting students."

Although released as a response to the Commission on Campus Diversity, Bustamante and others were quick to point out that while all twelve of the Commission's recommendations relating to academic affairs were included in the Chancellor's proposal, all eleven other recommendations, those relating to student affairs, were not.

Instead, the Draft Action Plan outlines the creation of a new Center for Student Development, which will centralize control of

RFK Jr. criticizes environment policy

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Robert F. Kennedy Jr. spoke to an enthusiastic crowd in Bowker Auditorium last night, addressing a wide range of subjects, varying from the Bush administration's environmental policies to the need for campaign finance reform.

"This administration doesn't understand America," Kennedy said. "They don't understand the values that are worth dying for."

The central theme of Kennedy's lecture focused on many of the thoughts that are discussed in his book titled "Crimes Against Nature: How George W. Bush and His Corporate Pals are Plundering the Country and Hijacking our Democracy." The book, which was released in early August of 2004, attacks the President's policies, stating that President Bush has rewritten American environmental laws to favor industrial polluters, and replaced the environmental leaders in his administration with corporate executives who were at one time responsible for companies that were most guilty of polluting.

Kennedy also pointed some blame towards the American media, saying at one point in the lecture that "we are becoming the most entertained, but least informed people on Earth."

"They are not telling us the stories that are affecting our lives," Kennedy said.

Kennedy said that many people who have been critical of environmental reform have cited financial woes as the main reason for their opinion. He stated that he believes that in contrary, environmental support is support of a free-market capitalism.

"There's no stronger advocate for free-market capitalism than myself," Kennedy said. "The Bush administration however believes in capitalism for the poor and socialism for the rich."

"You have to remember the domination of government by business is called fascism," Kennedy added as the crowd cheered.

Often drawing to references of his father Robert F. Kennedy and his uncle President John F. Kennedy, Robert Kennedy Jr. spoke a great deal about family, values, God and nature during his wistful address to the near-capacity audience. He even at one point jokingly referred to the husband of Maria Shriver (daughter of Kennedy sister Eunice Kennedy Shriver) and Governor of California, Arnold Schwarzenegger as his "cousin."

Kennedy spoke fondly, and nostalgically of family, at one point mentioning his tours through Europe as a boy with his "Uncle Jack," saying that "everywhere we went we were met with hundreds, sometimes thousands of people, and it was all because they wanted to be near an American politician."

Kennedy says now America has become "the most hated country on Earth."

At the conclusion of the speech, Kennedy held a short question and answer session, in which audience members were allowed to participate. One student addressed Kennedy's comments about the Campaign targets Apple computers

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

A national campaign to reduce electronic waste has targeted Apple Computers for failing to develop a recycling policy that would prevent harmful toxins found in its products from polluting the environment.

The Computer Take Back Campaign has made Apple the focus of its effort to reduce electronic waste, the fastest growing municipal waste stream in the United States.

After encouraging computer industry leaders Hewlett Packard and Dell to update their recycling policies, The Computer Take Back Campaign has accused Apple of lagging behind the competition by not enacting recycling polices that match their forward thinking image.

"Apple seems to be the only company saying 'no' right now, and we're not really sure why," said Rob Chamberlain, a representative of the University of Massachusetts branch of the Computer Take Back Campaign.

"They have this really progressive image, and it just isn't matching up with their actions."

"It's odd because when the Computer Take Back Campaign targeted Dell, they finally came around and started advocating our campaign, and so has HP," Chamberlain added.

Apple currently complies with legislation in Europe and Japan that requires companies to set up take back programs for retired products.

It is only in the United States that Apple has yet to set up any such programs.

Conclave elects Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger as pope

By Nike Price
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — The smoke wafting into the sky Tuesday appeared to be white, but was it? Nobody could be sure as 17 agonizing minutes ticked by on the ornate clock atop St. Peter's Basilica. Then the bells below began to toll and people screamed in joy.

More than 100,000 faithful overflowed St. Peter's Square and spilled into the streets of Rome to cheer as Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger of Germany emerged from the red velvet drapes of the basilica as Pope Benedict XVI.

"Benedetto!" the crowd chanted. "Viva il Papa!" National flags waved above the multitudes. People from six continents hugged their neighbors and jumped in joy. Many shed tears of bliss; some wept in disappointment.

"We love you!" screamed Hans Gonzalez, 31, of San Francisco, pumping his arms in the air.

The announcement of a new pope kept everyone guessing to the end. People had been packing the square since Monday evening to watch the Sistine Chapel chimney for signs of the election. Black smoke meant an unsuccessful ballot; white smoke — accompanied by bells — meant the cardinals had chosen a new pope.

When the smoke went up at 5:45 p.m., it seemed white. But after two false alarms in as many rounds of voting, no one was sure.

People argued about the color of the smoke. Some sections of the crowd were silent; others jumped in the air chanting, "Habemus papam!" — "We have a pope!" Waves of applause gave way to the silence of uncertainty.

As the minutes passed many began to believe the smoke had been black, because no bells were ringing. "When it blows in front of the wall it really looks white, but where are the bells?" asked Jose Ignacio Rodriguez, 28, of Puebla, Mexico.

There was a brief flutter when the bells rang at 6 p.m., but the cheers died down when they stopped. They had been ringing the hour.

Only two minutes passed before they started up again, and it was official.

People screamed and climbed onto their chairs. Wild applause spread through the crowd.

"Oh my gosh, this is insane!" said Amy Turnipseed, 21, of Bakersfield, Calif.

Italian Carmela da Lazo, 65, called home to deliver a matter-of-fact report: "The bell is ringing," she said. Then, she added: "Ciao."

People rushed toward Vatican City from across Rome, many of them running to try to catch a glimpse of the new pope as he appeared on the balcony. More than 100,000 people crowded into the square and into surrounding streets.

Thousands gather to remember Oklahoma City bombing tragedy

By Kelly Kurt

OKLAHOMA CITY — Children who lost their parents in the Oklahoma City bombing recited the names of the dead, and mourners gently laid bouquets on empty chairs symbolizing each victim Tuesday as they observed the 10th anniversary of the nation's worst act of domestic terrorism.

In a church that served as a temporary morgue after the blast, more than 1,600 people remembered those who died with 168 seconds of silence starting at 9:02 a.m., the moment that the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building collapsed into a heap of desks, concrete, and bodies on April 19, 1995.

They also honored the survivors, the rescuers and the endurance of a damaged city that former President Clinton said "made us all Americans again."

"Oklahoma City changed us all. It broke our hearts and lifted our spirits and brought us together," said Clinton, who was in office on the sunny morning that Timothy McVeigh brought his bomb and hatred for the government to the city in a Ryder truck.

Across the street at the Oklahoma City National Memorial, in the grassy field where the building once stood, 168 empty chairs were a solemn reminder of the carnage of a decade earlier. Teddy bears were placed on miniature chairs representing the 19 children slain in the building's day-care.

Former President Bill Clinton, second from the left, stands alongside Vice President Dick Cheney among others at a ceremony in honor of those lost in the Oklahoma City bombing.

Juanita Espinosa wiped away tears as she stood in front of the pint-sized chair of her cousin, 2-year-old Zackary Chavez.

Massachusetts hopeful for pope

BOSTON — At the epicenter of the clergy sex abuse scandal that brought unprecedented changes and multimillion-dollar settlements to the Roman Catholic church, Massachusetts Catholics were hoping — but not hopeful — that the next pope would help to reform a church some believe is out of step.

The selection of German Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger as the next pope was greeted Tuesday as a gain for the status quo and a setback for critics who see the clergy sex abuse crisis as an outgrowth of an unaccountable, topdown hierarchy.

"He tends to regard the abuse crisis as a result of the decadence of American society seeping into the seminaries and into the clergy, with the understanding that the American press exaggerates it because it's interested in sensationalism and titillation," said Stephen Pope, chairman of the theology department at Jesuit-run Boston College.

He said Ratzinger's recent sermons and his service since 1981 as head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith have earned him a reputation as a fierce critic of efforts to reform church hierarchy.

"I don't think he considers the crisis to be one of power, and a reflection of the need for real changes in the way church decisions are made," Pope said.

Ratzinger, 78, was a close confidant of his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, who died on April 2.

The dean of the College of Cardinals used his homily at the Mass dedicated to electing the next pope to warn the faithful about tendencies that he considered dangers to the faith: sects, ideologies like Marxism, liberalism, atheism, agnosticism and relativism — the ideology that there are no absolute truths.

Ratzinger has disciplined church dissidents and upheld church policy against attempts by liberals for reforms, and sees obedience to church doctrine as crucial.

Springfield Bishop Timothy McDonnell said in a statement that Ratzinger's selection has given the church "the gift of continuity, the gift of grace and the gift of ongoing pastoral ministry. The people of the Diocese of Springfield promise our new Holy Father their affection, their fidelity, and their prayers, we know that God will grace him with the ability to lead and to strengthen all God's people."

Closing arguments given in murder trial

BOSTON — Lawyers for two brothers charged with murdering a 22-year-old homeless woman claimed their clients are scapegoats, blamed for the crime by a "cast of society's misfits."

Ana White and Lauren Alleyne, both 21, avoided life in prison when they pleaded guilty to helping kill Jo Nachwey on Nov. 3, 2001. In exchange, they testified against four men who allegedly plotted the murder to send a message to other recruits in their fledgling gang.

In their closing arguments Tuesday, lawyers for Ismael Vasquez, 27, and his 22-year-old brother, Luis, claimed the women are liars who couldn't keep their stories straight when police questioned them.

Elliot Weinstein, Ismael Vasquez's attorney, described White as a "manipulative, deceiving sociopath" who laughed, joked and sang along with Alleyne in the back of a police cruiser after they were arrested.

"These young women have a powerful reason to blame others," Weinstein said. "Would each lie to regain their freedom? Would each lie to avoid spending the rest of their lives in state prison? Of course they would, and they did."

Alleyne signed her plea agreement three days before the trial started, five months after White cut her deal.

"She saw the deal Ana White was getting," said Luis Vasquez's lawyer, Michael Doolin. "As a result of that, she's a parrot and she's a copycat."

Ivy League students strike

By Matt Apuzzo
Associated Press

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Hundreds of graduate students at Yale and Columbia kicked off a five-day teaching strike Monday, a coordinated movement that organizers hope will force Ivy League administrators to recognize them as a union.

It is the first ever multi-campus strike for Ivy League graduate student teachers, who face an uphill battle to win recognition. The National Labor Relations Board ruled last year that graduate students at private universities are students, not workers, and cannot form unions.

To win union recognition, universities would have to voluntarily grant it — something they have refused to do.

The graduate students have pledged not to teach classes, grade papers or host review sessions this week. Their demands include health care for family members and a grievance process that would allow student teachers to raise concerns with the universities.

Yale and Columbia administrators say the strikes should have minimal effect on classes. The unions predicted hundreds of teaching assistants would walk out, but the exact number would not be known for days because graduate students teach classes at different times.

"All the classes and sections scheduled today appear to be covered, either because the grad student involved is not participating in the strike or because the faculty have made other arrangements," Yale spokesman Tom Conroy said.

Union organizers have found Ivy League campuses the ideal backdrop for a national drive to bring graduate students under the union umbrella. But Monday's strike represented a new tact. Rather than fighting individual administrators, which has proven unsuccessful, unions hope coordinated efforts will force a sea change in the Ivy League.

"We're in a fight against the Bush administration, who refuse to recognize graduate students as teachers," Connecticut Secretary of State Susan Bysiewicz, a Yale graduate, said at a morning rally with about 250 pickets and supporters.

Bysiewicz certified last year that the pro-union group at Yale represented about 500 graduate student teachers. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer made a similar certification for the group at Columbia, which claims about 1,000 members. Both moves were strictly symbolic.

At Columbia, graduate students were scheduled to take buses to City Hall, where several union members said they planned to testify about unions in higher education.

"Quite a few classes have been either canceled or moved off campus," said Dehlia Hannah, a philosophy graduate student at Columbia.

Yale organizers did not ask that classes be moved off campus.

all forty core student organizations — including the Student Government Association, Office of African Latino Asian Native American Affairs, Everywoman's Center, Greek Affairs, Legal Services, WMUA, UVC-TV19 and the Daily Collegian — and place them in the hands of a new Associate Vice Chancellor. The Center would also take control of over two hundred Registered Student Organizations.

"What concerns us the most is that his proposal will strip the independence and autonomy of the student organizations on campus," said Mushy Leiblum, a junior Social Thought and Political Economy major and member of Take Back UMass, the undergraduate group. "We're talking about a power grab."

Asked about the process for the Draft Action Plan's approval and implementation, Jeff Napolitano, also a member of Take Back UMass, replied bluntly, "There is no process. It's whatever the Chancellor wants." While there is a feedback period for the plan, critics view it as largely symbolic. The feedback period is set to expire by the end of this week.

The Graduate Employee Organization is cosponsoring Thursday's events, and has urged all Teaching Assistants and Resident Advisors to attend GEO rallies instead of classes. The union, which represents over 2400 graduate employees, is protesting the same failed contract negotiations that provoked a March 31 rally of some 600 GEO members and supporters. Members allege that the university is refusing to back down on proposed cuts to wages and benefits, including health and child care.

Meghan McDonough, a graduate student and mother of a three-year-old child, was especially concerned with the plan to shut down the University Child Care service. "UCC has been a real resource for me on campus and a lot of others," she said, adding that the daycare program made it possible for her to work toward her Master's.

"I think the university is trying to move toward running this place like a business, and not like any take back programs of its own, Apple has also lobbied against legislation in Maine that would require companies to take back obsolete products.

One of the goals of the Computer Take Back Campaign has been to raise awareness among Apple users and employees.

At the UMass Mac User Group's second annual Mac Expo, members of the Computer Take Back Campaign were on hand to pass out information sheets and postcards that will be filled out delivered to Apple CEO Steve Jobs.

"I talked to members of the Mac User group about our campaign a few days ago, and they were totally enthusiastic about it," said Chamberlain.

"So the strategy now is to get them involved. They seem like a really tight network, and they also seem like they are really interested in progressive movements."

Dave Isbitz, President of the UMass Mac User Group agreed that it was time Apple to step up their recycling policy. "I totally applaud [the Computer Take Back Campaign], Apple needs to get with the times."

According to the Computer Take Back Campaign's Web site 133,000 personal computers are retired and replaced each day.

Contained in these computers are hazardous materials such as plastic, lead, cadmium, chromium, and mercury, all of which can pollute groundwater when placed in landfills.

Despite the hazards of electronic waste, only ten to 15 percent of unwanted PCs are recycled in the United States. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, the amount of electronic waste in landfills will increase four fold in the next few years.

"It's a big problem that doesn't get a lot of coverage," said Rob Chamberlain.

"It's not something you see on a day to day basis, and their isn't really anybody pushing for it to be visible."

According to "unApple: An Alternative Annual Report," found on the The Computer Take Back Campaign's Web site, there will be 10.5 million old Apples in need of recycling in the United States by the year 2008.

These retired computers will account for 1.4 tons of lead.

Discarded electronic equipment currently accounts for 40 percent of the lead found in landfills in the United States.

Regina Bonny, a retired undercover agent with the Drug Enforcement Agency who was pulled from the debris, placed wreaths and flowers on the chairs of four slain co-workers. "I pray over them. I talk to them," she said. "I'll never let anyone forget them."

McVeigh was convicted of federal conspiracy and murder charges and executed on June 11, 2001. Conspirator Terry Nichols is serving multiple life sentences after being convicted in federal and state court.

"I'm on the road to forgiveness," said Jannie Coverdale, who lost her two young grandsons, Aarun and Elijah, in the blast. "I will feel much better once I can forgive Tim McVeigh and Terry Nichols."

Vice President Dick Cheney also spoke at the ceremony, telling survivors and family members of victims that goodness has overcome the evil of the blast in the last 10 years.

"All humanity can see you experienced bottomless cruelty and responded with heroism," Cheney said. "Your strength was challenged and you held firm. Your faith was tested and it has not wavered."

In a statement, President Bush said Oklahoma City "will always be one of those places in our national memory where the worst and the best both came to pass."

Clinton got a chuckle when he mentioned the Survivor Tree, the elm that was heavily damaged in the bombing and is now a leafy green reminder of it.

"Boy, that tree was ugly when I first saw it (in 1995), but survive it did," Clinton said.

"Trees are good symbols for what you did. You can't forget the past of a tree. It's in the roots, and if you lose the roots you lose the tree. But the nature of the tree is to always reach for tomorrow. It's in the branches."

Behind him sat living symbols of hope: four fidgeting children who survived the blast.

P.J. Allen, Brandon and Rebecca Denny and Christopher Nguyen reminded the crowd of the memorial's creed, "May all who leave here know the impact of violence. May this memorial offer comfort, strength, peace, hope and serenity."

The former president and the vice president stood and applauded them.

a democratic and publicly funded institution," McDonough said, linking the Chancellor's plan with the proposed cuts in graduate employee wages and benefits.

Nationwide activism by graduate students has been on the rise in recent months. Graduate students at Columbia and Yale are striking this week in order to gain union recognition. At Harvard, students launched a campaign calling on the their school to divest from a Chinese firm linked to the genocide in Sudan, succeeding earlier this month. Also, in Boston last Wednesday, students demonstrated on the Boston Common in support of the faculty union at Emerson College.

Historian and local activist Howard Zinn, author of "A People's History of the United States" endorsed Thursday's events at the University of Massachusetts early in the week. "I would like to express my solidarity with the graduate students at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst," Zinn said in a written statement. "Graduate students have too often been exploited as cheap labor by academic institutions, and it is refreshing to see them organizing and demanding their rights."

On Tuesday, flyers encouraging students and staff to boycott Thursday's classes were ubiquitous on campus. At press time, many classes for Thursday, which is a Monday schedule due to the long weekend, had been cancelled. Nearly 200 professors had signed a statement pledging not to punish their students for missing class tomorrow.

Picketing is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m. around Lederle, Bartlett, Herter, and Thompson Halls, with a teach-in to be held at the Student Union. At noon, a barbeque will be held on the Student Union lawn. Threnreich will be speaking at 1:00pm on the Student Union steps, followed by another teach-in.

Chancellor Lombardi could not be reached for comment. A spokesman for the university, Ed Blaguszewski, maintained that "the university is open for business (and) classes are scheduled" for Thursday.

Blaguszewski declined to estimate how many students will choose to forego classes tomorrow. "We'll see what happens," he said.

Reaction among students ranged from indifferent to supportive. Kristen Bollo, a junior sociology major, said she sympathizes with the graduate students. "They're the facilitators of this entire institution," she said, adding that her experience with teaching assistants here has been very positive.

While no student interviewed disagreed with the sentiments behind the demonstrations, some questioned how much a walkout would really change.

"I don't really see how this will affect the situation, beyond making it harder for me and my professors to have class," said Joe Liskowsky, a senior who is majoring in physics.

But Napolitano denied that the boycott would hurt students' education. "The fact of the matter is, we're trying to make it so that student's diplomas are worth more when they get out of here. We're calling for administration accountability, more tenured faculty," and graduate students who are treated fairly, he said. "We're looking at the long term of this."

Judge to consider accepting guilty plea from terrorist

By Mark Sherman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal judge is considering for the second time in three years whether to accept a guilty plea from Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person in the United States charged in connection with the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema's decision is expected to hinge on whether she believes Moussaoui is mentally competent to make the decision, lawyers who have followed the case said Tuesday.

The judge summoned lawyers on both sides of the case to a closed courtroom in Alexandria, Va., on Tuesday to discuss a letter Moussaoui sent the court indicating his desire to plead guilty. The letter's contents are under seal but a legal source said Moussaoui indicates his desire to plead guilty. The source spoke only on condition of anonymity because the letter has not been made public.

Prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case declined to comment about the meeting. However, the source said Brinkema plans to meet with Moussaoui sometime this week.

Among the issues the judge will have to consider in deciding whether to allow the plea is the strained relationship Moussaoui has had with her and his lawyers since his indictment in December 2001, as well as his desire to use the legal proceedings to put U.S. foreign policy on trial.

"A judge has to be satisfied that the defendant is mentally fit to make such a plea and also to be sure that the defendant understands what his rights are, and that means having advice of counsel," said Stephen Dycus, a professor at Vermont Law School.

In this case, Moussaoui often has been at odds with his court-appointed lawyers, accusing them of wanting to have him executed. He fired them, but Brinkema kept them on a standby basis and later revoked Moussaoui's right to defend himself.

His legal team has argued strenuously against the death penalty, and is likely to oppose the guilty plea if it includes the possibility of a death sentence.

"Pleading guilty waives all legal challenges to the government's case against you, so defense lawyers in capital cases really don't like their clients to plead guilty," said Michael Melik, also a Vermont Law School professor.

A separate trial to determine his sentence would follow any plea.

The government has accused Moussaoui of participating in an al-Qaida conspiracy to commit terrorism that included the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington. Moussaoui, a French citizen, tried to plead guilty in 2002 but took back the plea a week later.

His trial has been delayed three times. In March the Supreme Court declined to review an appeals court ruling denying Moussaoui direct access to three al-Qaida witnesses, who he believes might support his contention that he was not involved with the Sept. 11 planning. The court also allowed the government to seek the death penalty.

Majority Republicans push for confirmation from Bolton

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Majority Republicans pushed for swift confirmation of sharp-tongued John Bolton as U.N. ambassador Tuesday in a rancorous committee session. The Senate's top Democrat raised the possibility of trying to block the nomination when it reaches the full Senate.

A pivotal Republican senator said he would support Bolton, giving the nomination a crucial boost.

Republicans hold a 10-8 majority on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which was preparing to vote on Bolton's nomination, and eight of the 10 had said they would vote for Bolton. Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island became the ninth, saying shortly before the panel met he would support the nomination reluctantly.

"Under the regrettable circumstances, I'm as comfortable as I can be," Chafee told The Associated Press. "The president gets to choose his team. Most importantly for me, he's going to be on a short leash with a choke collar."

Meanwhile, the White House said President Bush had no second thoughts about Bolton despite critics' complaints about his treatment of subordinates and dismissive comments on the U.N.

Democrats on the committee repeatedly asked for delays in the vote, but a spokesman for chairman Richard Lugar, R-Ind., said Lugar saw no reason to delay.

"I do not think the concerns raised about Secretary Bolton warrant our rejection of the president's selection for his own representative to the U.N.," Lugar said in a statement prepared for Tuesday's session.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan, asked if Bush had any reservations about Bolton's fitness for the post, replied: "Absolutely not."

Bolton has addressed all questions about his record and behavior by testifying before the committee and offering additional answers to the panel in writing, McClellan said.

Bolton is a harsh critic of the United Nations bureaucracy and thus a provocative choice to be Washington's representative to the world body. Most of the allegations that have accompanied his nomination, however, concern his personal dealings and judgment.

The allegations attempted to paint Bolton as an imperious hothead who dressed down junior bureaucrats and withheld information from his superiors in his current job as the State Department's arms control chief.

There were repeated questions by senators at his confirmation hearing last week concerning what Bolton may have done to punish or pressure underlings who crossed him. A senior colleague called him a "serial abuser."

Bolton denied he did anything improper, but said he had "lost confidence" in two intelligence analysts who disagreed with him.

Salaries don't mimic inflation

BOSTON (AP) — For the first time in eight years, increases in college faculty salaries failed to keep up with inflation, according to a new survey.

The 2.8 percent increase in average salaries this year exceeded last year's 2.1 percent gain, but real salaries fell because of higher inflation, according to the American Association of University Professors' most recent annual survey, released Monday.

Average faculty salary for all ranks at all institutions was $68,505. Salaries for full professors at private universities rose 4 percent to $127,214, while at public research institutions they rose 3.5 percent to $97,948.

Overall, women faculty earned on average $59,508, about 80 percent of the $74,004 average for men — a ratio that is the same as it was in 1996-97. At the level of full professor, women earn on average 88 percent of men's salaries.

The report by the Washington-based AAUP said a disproportionate number of women hold lower-ranked faculty positions, and they are more concentrated at associate degree or baccalaureate colleges, where salaries are generally lower than at research universities.

But the AAUP also said the discrepancy is likely even higher than its measurements indicate, because the survey only includes full-time faculty, and women are also disproportionately represented among part-timers.

Hotel fire in Paris kills twenty-four

By Verena Von Derschau
Associated Press

PARIS — A night watchman's girlfriend who placed candles on the floor to set the scene for a romantic tryst but then left in a rage over his drunken state may have accidentally caused last week's hotel fire that killed 24 people, prosecutors said Tuesday.

The woman, who was detained Monday, told police she placed a dozen burning candles on the floor of the breakfast room of the Paris Opera hotel, then threw piles of clothes on the floor and left after she became angry that her boyfriend was drunk.

The prosecutors' office announced it was opening an investigation for "fire caused involuntarily, manslaughter and involuntary injuries." The woman, identified only as 31-year-old Fatima, was placed under investigation — a step short of being charged — Tuesday evening, judicial officials said. She was in custody.

The night watchman, whose name was not released, was in a coma. France-3 television said the man was "between life and death" after having jumped from an upper floor window during the fire. The report could not be confirmed.

Several guests trapped by the blaze died by jumping from windows of the overcrowded, six-story hotel during the fire, which was Paris' worst in recent memory. A 1973 blaze in an eastern Paris school killed 20 people, 16 of them students.

Officials raised the death toll Tuesday to 24, including 11 children. Twenty-seven people remained hospitalized, 14 in serious condition, officials said. The nationalities of the dead have not been released, but the budget hotel housed many African immigrants and other people without means who were placed there by social services.

Bouquets of flowers decorated the perimeter of the scorched hotel following a demonstration on Monday by two advocacy groups, Right to Housing and Rights First, to denounce "the scandalous treatment the government reserves for the poor and the needy."

Social services have relocated the survivors to another hotel in a Paris suburb, while families continued their search for loved ones.

The statement by the prosecutors' office said Fatima was the girlfriend of the night watchman and went to the hotel at his request.

The suspect told criminal investigators that she "could be" at the origin of the fire that started shortly after 2 a.m. Friday in the second-floor breakfast room, the prosecutors' office said.

"After a violent dispute that she blamed on the inebriation of her companion, she finally left the hotel, throwing several piles of clothes on the floor in a fit of rage, without paying attention to the candles," prosecutors said in a statement.

The 32-room hotel in Paris' 9th district, which is popular with tourists, was meant to accommodate 61 people, but at least 90 people were known to be living there. It only had a single exit.

Police originally suspected an accidental fire caused by a technical problem. The hotel's fire prevention system had been checked March 24 and four recommendations to improve safety were issued, but the problems were not serious enough to close down the hotel, police said.

Still, Interior Minister Dominique de Villepin said Sunday he plans to work quickly toward new measures to reinforce fire regulations, suggesting they could be ready within weeks.

Iraqi lawmakers demanding apology

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraqi lawmakers adjourned in protest Tuesday and demanded an apology after a Shiite legislator linked to a radical anti-American cleric tearfully said he was handcuffed and humiliated at a U.S. checkpoint.

It was the third consecutive day that Iraq's interim parliament was sidetracked from its job of setting up a government and writing a constitution.

Beyond the sandbags and blast walls of the U.S.-protected Green Zone, where the National Assembly meets, at least a dozen Iraqis were killed and more than 60 wounded in a series of attacks, including two that targeted the army and its recruits.

Al-Qaida in Iraq, the nation's most feared terrorist group, claimed responsibility for the worst attack, a suicide bombing near an army recruitment center in Baghdad that police said killed at least six Iraqis and wounded 44.

A car bomb in western Baghdad targeting a U.S. patrol wounded seven Iraqis, police and hospital officials said.

Laith Abdullah, the husband of a woman injured in the attack, angrily criticized the legislature for worrying more about its rights than the violence. "The government should be concerned about all the people getting hurt," Abdullah said.

But in the National Assembly, lawmaker Fattah al-Sheik stood and cried as he described being stopped at a checkpoint on the way to work Tuesday. He claimed an American soldier kicked his car, mocked the legislature, handcuffed him and held him by the neck.

"What happened to me represents an insult to the whole National Assembly that was elected by the Iraqi people. This shows that the democracy we are enjoying is fake," al-Sheik said. "Through such incidents, the U.S. Army tries to show that it is the real controlling power in the country, not the new Iraqi government."

Al-Sheik's small party has been linked to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who led uprisings against the U.S.-led coalition in 2004. On his way home after the session, gunmen fired on al-Sheik's convoy, but he escaped unharmed, police and his party said.

The U.S. military said its initial investigation indicated that in the morning, al-Sheik got into an altercation with a coalition translator at the checkpoint. U.S. soldiers tried to separate them and "briefly held on to the legislator," while preventing another member of al-Sheik's party from getting out of his vehicle, a military statement said.

"We have the highest respect for all members of the Transitional National Assembly. Their safety and security is critically important," U.S. Brig. Gen. Karl R. Horst said in the statement. "We regret this incident occurred and are conducting a thorough investigation."

During a one-hour adjournment to protest al-Sheik's treatment, lawmaker Salam al-Maliki read an assembly statement demanding an apology from the U.S. Embassy and the prosecution of the soldier who allegedly mistreated the legislator.

Hajim al-Hassani, the parliament speaker, said: "We reject any sign of disrespect directed at lawmakers."

Each day this week, the legislature's opening session on current affairs has extended well beyond the scheduled 30 minutes. Legislators have discussed traffic jams in Baghdad, Saddam Hussein's alleged war crimes, claims that hostages were being held south of Baghdad and al-Sheik's complaint.

Conclave elects Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger of Germany as new pope

Some priests and seminarians in clerical garb broke into a run. Nuns pulled up their long skirts and jogged. Shopkeepers closed early, and drivers honked their horns when they got stuck in the crowds. Police tried to direct traffic, but to little effect.

The throngs met their new pontiff with cheers and horns, then went silent and knelt on the cobblestones as Benedict gave his first blessing as pope. Moments later, the faithful erupted again in cheers, chants and hymns.

"This is the perfect miracle, being here and seeing the new pope," said Maria Jose Mora, 44, a banker from Spain.

"I have, like, butterflies in my stomach," said Teresa Madden, 20, of Steubenville, Ohio. "I just want to laugh."

Not everyone was happy, however. Jose Silvano, a 40-year-old travel agent from Brazil, called Ratzinger an "ultraconservative."

"He is the right pope for the cardinals, but not for the people," Silvano said. "We were hoping for a South American, a Brazilian, a pope who would work for the neediest and the rights of women and children."

Niels Hendrich, 40, of Hamburg, Germany, jumped up and down at the prospect of a new pope — but then gave only three halfhearted claps when he learned who it was.

"I am not happy about this at all," he said. "Ratzinger will put the brakes on all the progressive movements in the church that I support."

But many in the crowd were clearly thrilled with the choice of Ratzinger.

"The cardinals elected a good and holy man who was close to Pope John Paul II," said Mark Wunsch, 27, a religious philosophy student from Denver. "He'll be a wonderful and good leader in preaching the truth and love."

Many in the crowd had made their favorite cardinal known since the beginning of the conclave. A group of Hondurans waved their national flag in support of Oscar Andres Rodriguez Maradiaga. Brazilians chanted for Claudio Hummes. A group of young Italians held up a banner playing off a liquor ad — "No Martini, No Party" — in support of Carlo Maria Martini.

The newly-elected Pope Benedict XVI waves to a crowd at Vatican City yesterday.

Class boycott not a good step toward change

The Graduate Employee Organization is planning a boycott of classes tomorrow to make clear to the administration that their contract negotiations will not be tolerated. In addition to the boycott, which the GEO is encouraging all students to participate in, there will also be a rally held to drum up support for their cause and make clear their complaints and concerns. This boycott, however, is not the appropriate way to go about handling the situation and is being used as another reason to skip class. The GEO's message is lost to their act of defiance.

It is certainly understandable how the graduate students disapprove of the raising of their fees. And, in a town such as Amherst, where living costs are comparably expensive, to raise those fees without raising their wages is unjust. But, the act of a boycott will not help to raise those wages.

For one thing, the boycott was not well explained. There were no alternatives given to not attending classes, classes that undergraduate students pay for and must be held. Students have seen the flyers around campus directing them to boycott their classes, yet there has not been a clear reason why or what students are supposed to do instead of going to class.

The aim of this boycott is to get the attention of the administration, to get them to listen to the GEO and reconsider their contracts. It is no concern of the administration whether or not students skip classes. In the end, the onus is on the individual students to go to class and perform the work accordingly. To the administration, this will be seen as just another excuse to skip class, which completely outweighs and silences any valid points the GEO was hoping to make.

For students to not even have the option of a class is absurd. They are paying a very large amount of money to be a student here and attend classes. And members of the GEO, which is primarily made up on graduate teaching assistants, are supposed to be proponents of education, as well as being students themselves.

Additionally, Resident Assistants have been abusing their rank as advocates to residents by putting up fliers for the boycott. To encourage their residents to skip class without giving them an alternative is troubling and violates the role that RAs play in residence halls. They should be engaging in discussion among their residents about the issues brought up by the GEO, not encouraging them to cut class because everyone else is doing it.

There are many other more effective ways that the GEO can go about achieving their goals. A sit-down discussion with Chancellor John V. Lombardi, voicing their discontent and their concerns is a more appropriate method of dealing with the situation. The administration would be more likely to take their thoughts and objections into consideration if they were presented in a calm, rational manner. Boycotting class serves little purpose except to deny UMass students the right to an education.

Women's rights to their bodies

Amelia Sabadini

I was introduced (formally) to "frustration-aggression theory" in the Psych 360 course I took just last semester. This theory basically states that the more entitled a person feels to something the more frustrated they'll feel if they don't get it and, subsequently, the more apt they are to behave aggressively. In light of this, I have to wonder about the preponderance of magazines consistently featuring near-naked women and the declaration "for men" on their covers.

I suppose I should make it indisputably clear that I have no problems with depictions of nudity or anything that approaches it so long as the depictions are derived from consenting adults. It's the words that are troubling. The proclaimed exclusion of women from the magazine's audience is only half the offense. The other half is infinitely more insidious. It is the subtle but unrelenting implication that women's bodies are "for men."

Of course these magazines aren't the only mediums to assert that men are entitled to women's bodies. It also happens to be integral to the Judaic-Christian creation myth. Maybe this would explain the recent advent of pharmacists refusing to fill birth control prescriptions for female patients? The surface explanation offered for these refusals is that they are perpetrated in the interest of saving the lives of unborn children.

This seems strange given how any pregnancies resulting from a pharmacists' meddling with prescribed birth control would be unwanted and as such have a heightened probability of ending in abortion. It also doesn't add up when it's taken into consideration that many birth control pills work by causing the formation of a mucus plug at the cervix (this normally happens in pregnancy) so it's like having a diaphragm in all the time.

Some pills do work by inhibiting the implantation of eggs in the uterine lining and this is considered tantamount to abortion by some people. From there it becomes a debate about when life starts. However, putting that aside for a moment, what about the fact that the pharmacist has no way or right to know if the patient is taking the birth control pills for contraception or to regulate menstrual cycles or alleviate the very painful symptoms of endometriosis?

A pharmacist's refusal to fill any prescription reveals a dangerously arrogant supposition that their knowledge of their patient's health supercedes that of the prescribing physician.

A pharmacist's refusal to fill any prescription reveals a dangerously arrogant supposition that their knowledge of the patient's health supercedes that of the prescribing physician. How can there be any thought of indulging such irresponsible behavior? Perhaps because so far, these refusals have only happened to women who were attempting to responsibly oversee their own reproductive activities.

As of now, these pharmacists' deviations from professional conduct have concurred with the notion that women do not have sovereignty over their own bodies. Unfortunately, this seems to be a notion that many people are willing and even eager to propagate despite that it is fundamentally oppressive and unjust. Were it not that so many people have no problems with usurping a woman's control of her body, then there would be no states with pharmacist refusal laws.

According to the National Women's Law Center's Web site (updated April 14), three states (Arkansas, Mississippi and South Dakota) have passed laws that let pharmacists refuse to fill prescriptions if doing so would infringe upon their personal beliefs. Similar legislation has been introduced in 26 states. The Access to Legal Pharmaceuticals Act that was just recently proposed in congress would only allow a pharmacist to refuse to fill a prescription if and only if there was another pharmacist on duty at said pharmacy that could (or rather would) fill the prescription. If this bill passes, it will offer some reprieve from the caprices of pharmacists who are deciding to divinely accredit themselves the authority of medical doctors.

Whether or not the access bill passes, pharmacists will still be allowed to refuse to do their jobs for certain people. How is this not considered out right discrimination? Pharmacists who refuse to fill birth control prescriptions are getting away with limiting the health care of a certain group of people. They're acting from the assumption that they are more entitled to maintain their peace of mind and positive self image (these are what religion and moral codes boil down to) than a given patient is to receive prescribed medicine. The fact that such behavior is being sanctioned only demonstrates that within our country a woman's basic human rights to control over her body and her life can be superceded by a stranger's sense of entitlement.

The new 'axis of evil'

Ethan Burke

Lofty rhetoric can't disguise the Bush administration's true intentions. The "war on terror" and the "axis of evil" are two slogans that portray the United States in an epic struggle between the protectors of all that is just and right against absolute evil. In this fairy tale world, President Bush can make statements like, "either you are with us, or against us."

The war on terror and the label "terrorist" has been used to justify war on Iraq, and by various government agencies to crack down on dissidents. Bush's Education Secretary even called the National Education Association, a "terrorist organization." There are an increasing number of comments suggesting the war on terror may spread to Latin America where there is a new "axis of evil."

Jack Epstein of the San Francisco Chronicle, reported April 30, 2004 in an article titled "General Seeks Boost for Latin American Armies," that General James Hill of U.S. Southern Command requested funds to "combat international terrorism" in Latin America. Hill described the threat of "traditional terrorists" including drug traffickers, urban crime gangs and paramilitary and guerrilla groups tied to drug trafficking. He warned of "emerging terrorists" described as "radical populists" who tap into "deep-seated frustrations of the failure of democratic reforms to deliver expected goods and services."

These "emerging terrorists" or "radical populists" (which are apparently the same), are tapping into Latin Americans frustrations over neo-liberal economic policies that have led to increased poverty, lack of education and health care and a general decline in standards of living.

Ginger Thompson of the New York Times writes about concerns over the resurgence of the Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua in an article published April 5 titled, "Old Foe of the U.S. trying for a comeback in Nicaragua."

She quotes Rumsfeld, who is particularly concerned that Nicaragua's Congress blocked the destruction of surface to air missiles that he believes "can be operated by terrorists, by revolutionaries and others," who "are anxious and willing to kill people."

Thompson writes, "Washington is worried once again that its old nemesis might win, this time with consequences for a new global war, on terrorism. Even though the elections here are more than a year and a half away, and even though Mr. Ortega's chances seem slim, the Bush administration is taking no chances and has begun concerted efforts to stop him." The United States recently suspended aid to Nicaragua as punishment for not destroying the missiles,

The war on terror and the label "terrorism" has been used to justify war on Iraq, and by various government agencies to crack down on dissidents.

sending the clear message that Nicaragua better not elect Ortega.

Efforts to undermine democracy in Nicaragua should come as no surprise given the Reagan-Bush administration's consistent disdain for democratic governments that resist U.S. economic dominance in Latin America.

Nicaragua suffered devastating terrorist attacks throughout the 80s at the hands of the U.S. sponsored contras, which continued its massacres and bombings until Nicaragua elected a U.S.-backed candidate in 1990.

Economic threats against Nicaragua are reminiscent of threats last year leveled at El Salvador. Numerous U.S. officials threatened to suspend aid, withhold remittances, revoke work visas and deport Salvadorans living in the U.S. if El Salvador elected the popular Frente Farabundo Marti para la Liberación Nacional candidate over the U.S.-backed candidate. The people of El Salvador succumbed to threats and elected the U.S.-backed candidate.

Rumsfeld has commented on Venezuela possibly purchasing 100,000 AK-47s from Russia saying, "I can't imagine why Venezuela needs 100,000 AK-47s. I can't imagine what is going to happen to 100,000 AK-47s."

Why would Venezuela need arms? Two coup attempts in the past five years against democratically elected President Hugo Chavez might be cause for alarm. One coup attempt in 2002 had short-lived success ousting Chavez for 48 hours before massive demonstrations brought Chavez back into power.

The 2002 coup attempt had all of the hallmarks of past CIA coups including meetings between Chavez's ouster Pedro Carmona and U.S. officials and funding of Chavez's opponents by the U.S. group with the Orwellian name "The National Endowment for Democracy." Carmona received a warm welcome in Washington after the overthrow of democratically elected Chavez.

Otto Reich, one of the many Reagan-Bush officials shuffled around the administrations, published an article in the National Review warning of troubles in our "peaceful neighborhood." Reich describes the danger posed by the "terrible two," Fidel Castro and Hugo Chavez, who are encouraging resistance that is engulfing Latin America with "irrational hostility" toward the U.S.

I don't expect Otto Reich to acknowledge the violent crimes against Latin America, the U.S. role in undermining democracy or the economic policies that have led to increased poverty throughout Latin America causing "irrational hostility." I hope most Americans can look past the emotional rhetoric of a "war on terror" against "evil" and a Metallica T-shirt. I found her to be very difficult to get help from. In fact, it almost seemed as though she viewed me as some sort of an annoyance, distracting her from the more important work that she needed to focus on. Later in the semester, I went again to the same advisor, with the same questions. This time, I was wearing a nice turtleneck sweater. The way I was treated was entirely contradictory to the previous visit, and I found her not only to be very helpful, but also genuine.

There is no 'us' and 'them'

Colin Jones

They're all true. Those annoying little phrases you've been hearing all your life. About moccasins. And glass houses. And stones. But we all do it anyway. We judge. We assume. Someone told me once, a long time ago, that when you assume, you make an ass of you and me. Sure it's corny, but she was right. You can't rely on first impressions. They're often based on how someone looks, or their behavior in a single moment.

Even our conception of someone that is formulated over time, the product of a number of successive interactions, can be incorrect. Unless you know someone well enough to really understand who they are, why and where they're coming from, you should always give them the benefit of the doubt.

Our reluctance to do exactly that is something that I have seen, time and time again, both first-hand and with others. There have been many times when I have been at a party, or walking around campus, and have heard conversations in which someone's character is torn to shreds. I'm always left wondering why.

These types of discussions are rarely warranted. Even when friends of mine are talking, harshly criticizing someone they barely know, I'm often curious as to what the person in question had done to prompt such a response. Not surprisingly, it generally was some insignificant faux pas, or something equally unimportant and pointless. There is no need to take things that aren't personal so personally.

The thing is, we're all complex. None of us are transparent, and we're all different things to each other.

So why do we do this? I'm tempted to say that it usually stems from our insecurities. It is unfortunate that we feel the need to tear others down in order to bring ourselves up. Also, I sometimes get the sense that there is a tendency for us to have expectations from someone, based on our initial impressions. This can cause us to unconsciously demand them to behave in a certain way and when they don't fill the role we've typecast them in, we somehow feel cheated.

The thing is, we're all complex. None of us are transparent, and we're all different things to each other. To one person, you might be a confidante. To another, a party animal. And to someone else, a gym buddy. We're always in flux, shifting gears from one situation to another.

For me, one of the more interesting things that I have noticed is how differently the same person will respond to me depending on the way in which I'm dressed. I remember going to see one of my advisors at the beginning of the year. The first time I went, I was wearing my leather jacket and my Metallica T-shirt. I found her to be very difficult to get help from. In fact, it almost seemed as though she viewed me as some sort of an annoyance, distracting her from the more important work that she needed to focus on. Later in the semester, I went again to the same advisor, with but rather aspects of ourselves that fall over them. Like a camera only records what the photographer sees, the viewer determines the view. We see what we want. We see how we want. We only see ourselves.

For this reason, it would be impossible for us to always be objective, to take everything at face value and to always give everyone the benefit of the doubt. But we can try. For example, maybe you come across an acquaintance, a friend of a friend or someone who used to live on your floor. When you stop to chat with them for a minute, they seem kind of guarded, a little standoffish.

Your natural inclination would be to assume that they were acting distant because of their feelings towards you. And while that might be the case, more often than not, it isn't. Really, you don't know why they acted the way they did; maybe they failed their last exam, or broke up with their girlfriend. If you can stop and think, separate yourself from the situation; your initial perception of their behavior won't taint your future interactions with them.

There are billions of people in this world. We all play a role in each others lives, no matter how small or large, but sometimes it is easy to forget that the story isn't just about us. The next time you feel like a victim, or that you're the subject of some vast underground conspiracy, stop and remind yourself that maybe it isn't about you. Sometimes the best way to improve a picture might be to remove yourself from the middle of it.

SING FOR ABSOLUTION

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Tonight, the Muse will rock the Cage with Hysteria, and that's not a bad thing. One of Britain's hottest rising acts is invading campus today accompanied by opening act Razorlight spunsored by MTVU's Campus Invasion Tour '05. The tour has already hit other college campuses in New England, including the University of Connecticut and Providence College.

In an interview with the Daily Collegian, Muse drummer Dominic Howard, 27, said the tour has been off to a great start. "In Atlanta, we probably saw our most enthusiastic crowd [thus far]. On most of this tour though, people are discovering us for the first time."

For those who do not know them, the Muse may at first seem to sound like Radiohead or the late Jeff Buckley fronting a hard rock band. Like most British bands of the past decade, the Muse had to overcome such comparisons and they have. The Muse are heavier and darker in their overall tone, but that's not to say Radiohead didn't influence them in their early stages.

"We aren't compared to [Radiohead] back at home, but that's because we've established ourselves. Any comparisons were dropped after our first album. 'Showbiz.' I suppose that's what people do though, you can't really respond to it," Howard said.

The story of how the Muse came to be isn't dissimilar to that of many other bands. The trio, lead singer Matthew Bellamy, bass guitarist Chris Wolstenholme, and drummer Dominic Howard were all childhood friends with a strong affinity for music. Taking inspiration from Nirvana and various British bands, the group began performing together. Their first band, Rocket Baby Dolls, was formed for a high school band competition.

"All that to say that the, well, the attitude meant a lot to us. So we won. And I think that psychologically it changed many things in our heads. Because we came to lose, we expected to lose. And we were angry somehow. And we had just realized at this time that we could replace lots of things. We realized that emotion, the vibrations that you create are as important as your technical skills. We had just discovered something: music is a matter of emotion," Bellamy said in an interview on micros.net.

Soon after, the band changed their name to "Muse," after becoming fascinated with an eclectic old man in their hometown of Teignmouth.

"It was a time when all the young people in town were becoming attracted art and music. There was this sort of strange old man who said a muse had descended on our town, and we were fascinated by that," Howard explained.

The group began playing gigs around England and were discovered by Taste Media after playing a show in a Cornish Village. It wasn't long until the band was signed to Madonna's record label Maverick, and recorded their first album, "Showbiz," which has sold over 700,000 copies worldwide. Their second album, "Origin of Symmetry", included the hit single "Plug-in Baby" which reached number 11 on the U.K. music charts.

However, the Muse didn't really cross the pond until their latest studio album, "Absolution" put out by Warner Brothers Records featuring a dense layer of sound with heavy piano and guitar. Howard's Jimmy Chamberlain inspired drumming is also quite apparent in the opening tracks.

The band was soon on a world tour, landing gigs at such massive festivals as Glastonbury in England and Coachella in Indio, CA. "Coachella was an amazing festival," Howard said, "it feels really good to share a stage with such talent as Nine Inch Nails and Coldplay. It was hard though, since we're not used to playing in a desert when its 115 degrees outside. We struggled to get through our set."

As one can imagine, worldwide tours do take their tolls on the artists. "Traveling is the best and worst part of the tour. We are lucky enough to be able to go to so many places and see so much, but at the same time we aren't as lucky. In some cities we only see the venue," said Howard. To keep themselves entertained, the group often sits down for games of Texas Hold'Em, and Dominic also watches Arrested Development.

The Campus Invasion Tour, features some new material the band has been working on, three new songs to be exact. "They're not titled yet, they're still in the experimental phase. Its great, and something to look forward to in a set," Howard said. The band plans to begin recording their next studio album when they return to England in June.

The Muse's set will be mostly songs from Absolution, as its their latest album and what American fans are mostly familiar with.

Meshuggah redefines the metal genre with 'Catch Thirty Three'

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Correspondent

Meshuggah (translated from Yiddish as "crazy") has always been somewhat of an enigma in the metal scene. Ever since their debut, "Psykisk Testbild," (Psychological Test Picture) this experimental Swedish metal band has constantly improved and expanded upon their unique mathematically precise style. "Catch Thirty-Three," Meshuggah's newest release, progresses forward from 2004's "I", a conceptual one-track EP. Although "Catch Thirty-Three" is divided into 13 tracks, the album is one long piece divided into four distinctive movements.

Meshuggah
'Catch Thirty Three'
Nuclear Blast America

In 1995 Meshuggah seized the attention of the metal community with, "Destroy, Erase, Improve." With this album, Meshuggah proceeded to tear down previous conventions of what metal music could be, creating in the wake an epitome to be envied and revered. After a two-month European tour and the EP "True Human Design," Meshuggah continued to shatter expectations with the brutally aggressive, "Chaosphere." 2002's "Nothing" was praised by some fans and detested by others. In the spirit of their constant evolution Meshuggah incorporated the use of 8-string guitars to achieve a unique, heavier sound. The music also changed as well, focusing more on mathematically precise riffs and masterful timing.

"Catch Thirty-Three" incorporates the technical calculations of, "Nothing," the experimentation of, "I", and the brutality of "Chaosphere" and "Destroy, Erase, Improve" to create one of Meshuggah's strongest and most mesmerizing releases to date.

The first movement of the album consists of the first three tracks. Immediately one can distinguish Meshuggah's trademark sound of machine-like, technical rhythms. Jens Kidman follows with growling yet precise vocals, "the struggle to free myself from my restraints becomes my very shackles."

"The Paradoxical Spiral" marks the beginning of the second movement. The track name seems to be evoked from the main riff. Crushing bass and guitar rhythms are weaved around a continuous distorted guitar piece in a sonic spiral. Meshuggah continues to pound this moment of serenity into another relentless jam session with eerie melodic solos.

An all encompassing machine-like voice (Tomas Haake) introduces the third movement. Set against a rotating, engine-like droning, this computerized monologue discusses complex themes of self-awareness. An ominous guitar passes replaces the dialogue. This passage is slowly complemented by bass guitar to create a sense of impending doom. Upon the passage's climax, Meshuggah's brutal guitars roar forward; layering fierce riffs and paranoid solos. "In Death is Life" raises the album to new levels of intensity building upon the previous track with gut-wrenching vocals and tightly controlled chaotic riffs.

The assault finally winds down after 10 solid minutes. A brooding riff is born out of the chaos. Immediately themes of hysteria, isolation, and confusion are aurally brought forth. It is now that the title of the song, "In Death is Death" becomes clear. The second half of the track is what could be considered a musical interpretation

Klezmatics break barriers with music

Widely acclaimed African American gospel singer Joshua Nelson adds soul to traditional Jewish folk songs.

Jews and Blacks have had a long history of shared oppression. The two groups also have a history of tension and conflict, but luckily there is music to bridge gaps.

In 1986, in New York City's East Village, a group of musicians came together to form The Klezmatics. They started with classic Yiddish folk songs and traditional Klezmer music (Klezmer is the traditional music of Jewish celebrations in Eastern Europe, a musical genre which inspired American jazz musicians such as Benny Goodman in the early decades of the twentieth Century), and later merged with the soul/gospel genre music.

On their eighth studio album, The Klezmatics collaborated with a talented singer from the South, named Joshua Nelson.

Nelson himself is Jewish, and is also African-American. When asked about his style, Nelson said in a press release, "I make Jewish music and give it a soul sound. They call it the gospel sound. But technically it is soul Jewish music. If you can put soul in Christian music, you can be Black and put soul in Jewish music." In this live CD, that was recorded last summer in Berlin, Nelson and the Klezmatics learn how to mesh their two genres together. With the different mixes of gifted musicians, a beautiful, harmonious sound is generated.

Nelson's voice is reminiscent of the late, great Mahalia Jackson, and one of her songs is included in the concert. Jackson was gospel music's first big crossover, who was appreciated by both blacks and white. Her music has inspired many current artists, and her songs have been covered by many musicians. The live album also includes a song by the legendary Sam Cooke. Cooke is best known for his thought provoking classic number, "A Change is Gonna Come," started his career as a gospel singer. His religious side is shown on "Oh Mary Don't You Weep", which is covered by the Klezmatics.

Though Nelson provides memorable additions to the group, the Klezmatics shine when they go back to their roots. The album begins with a traditional a Jewish number that is sung at the Passover Seder. Eyliyohu Hanovi is a solemn piece that has a very gothic, ancient sound. Even though it has been used for centuries, The Klezmatics are able to make it their own. They take a widely-known song and cover it in a unique, special way. It is very difficult to use a song that is easily identifiable and make it sound as if you wrote it, though the Klezmatics have accomplished this difficult task.

The Klezmatics and Joshua Nelson had a wonderful time working on the setlist for the Berlin concert together. Their idea was to cover the Passover seder in their concert using a combination of Black spirituals and Jewish traditional songs, and they followed their goal accordingly. They also speak about their compatibility that allowed for a more coherent music working experience. In the end, they were very pleased with the finished product, and the crowd in Berlin agreed. It was a joyful night, and their thrilling performances continued wherever they went. The band's energy was accepted quickly by the different crowds from around the world, and they should be a pleasure to watch when they come to University of Massachusetts.

Tonight at 8 p.m. The Klezmatics and Joshua Nelson will be at Bowker Auditorium to play songs off their new CD, "Brother Moses Smote The Water." The concert is free to five college students, and should be a great way to get a taste of both Black and Jewish cultures, and listen to some great music.

Alvin Ailey's Revelations

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

For the past 45 years, the Alvin Ailey Dance Theater has built a company that has made a large impact, not only in dance, but also in African American art and music in America. This weekend, the group will bring its unique act to the famous stage of the Wang Theatre in Boston.

Alvin Ailey was a mere 29 years old when he first premiered his tenth ballet, "Revelations," a performance completely choreographed by Mr. Ailey, became known as his biggest success. Critics have sighted Ailey's death in 1989 as one of the biggest blows to dance and performing arts in the twentieth century.

The inspiration for Ailey's "Revelation," a show that will be performed this weekend at Wang Theatre Performances, came from different sources, including his memories as a child and relationships with revolutionary African American writers James Baldwin and Langston Hughes.

"Revelations began with the music. As early as I can remember I was enthralled by the music played and sung in the small black churches in every small Texas town my mother and I lived in," Ailey said in a anniversary celebration quoted on the group's Web site alvinailey.org. "No matter where we were during those nomadic years, Sunday was always a church going day. There we would absorb some of the most glorious singing to be heard anywhere in the world."

Ailey says that he has early memories of the gospel songs played during services like "Wade in the Water." He says that it is these memories that helped him to create all of the feeling and emotion that are apparent in "Revelations."

"My plan was to make Revelations the second part of an all-black evening of dance. First would be the blues in Blues Suite, then spirituals in Revelations , then a section on Kansas City jazz (and) a section of contemporary music," Ailey continued to say in the release. "The aim was to show the coming and the growth and reach of black culture."

Ailey has created 79 ballets in his storied life, but the Alvin Ailey Dance Theatre was not created entirely to showcase the artist's work. The dance company has showcased more than 170 works by over 65 choreographers.

Since Ailey's death, Judith Jamison was appointed Artistic Director of the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater. Jamison was discovered by the acclaimed Agnes de Mille and in 1964, she had her New York debut with American Ballet Theatre. Ailey created many roles for Jamison, and consequently believed she was the best choice to continue his legacy.

of the mystery of death, a long deep look into that unknown, inevitable void.

Without pausing for a breath, the deep melodic passage that finished the third movement gives birth to an unstoppable juggernaut of intensity. Defying conventions, the track evolves into a visceral technical display combining riffs and layering instruments seamlessly. Amidst the onslaught a bellow flies alongside it all clocking in at 17 seconds. As if this vocal shock has created a hole, the riff floods right back in, paving the way for the final track of metal Armageddon. A melodically profound riff blends in marking the eventual winding down of the movement. This slow, gloomy riff becomes progressively slower like a dying machine and proceeds into a sinister solo.

"Catch Thirty-Three" marks a giant progressive step for Meshuggah. The album displays both the band's technical mastery in addition to their seemingly limitless progression and creativity. This deep conceptual album sets new standards for the entire metal genre. "Catch Thirty-Three" is not merely an album but a journey, a voyage into a sonic landscape of wonder and crushing intensity.

Plan to put smells in film doesn't pass the sniff test

By Jack Mathews
New York Daily News

You've heard of snuff movies? Sony has patented an idea for sniff movies.

According to the British magazine New Scientist, the Japanese electronics giant hopes to develop a device that will bombard viewers with pulses of ultrasound that will stimulate neural activity in our brains and have us smell something we're seeing on the screen.

Not only that, but we'll be able taste on cue and, possibly, have the sensation of being touched.

If they get this thing right, we could be watching "Sideways" and smell and taste that hint of "nutty Edam cheese" in the glass of Pinot Noir that Paul Giamatti is raving about. If they get it wrong, we might feel Giamatti's lips on Virginia Madsen's, which would not be satisfying to a large number of us.

A Sony spokesperson assured New Scientist that the process would be "non-invasive," but come on! I don't care how you get into my cortex and start yanking my neurons, it's invasive.

For people who worry about the radio waves entering their brains via cell phones, or getting too close to the microwave, the idea of paying their way into a dark place to be assaulted with ultrasound has to be vexing. But even if the sound waves are proven to be physiologically harmless, how about the psychological impact of losing control of your senses?

It's one thing to be stopped to smell the roses, but what if Quentin Tarantino wants us to know how it feels to have our throat slit?

This is a worse idea than subliminal advertising, worse than autosuggestion.

This is pure sensationalism!

Then, again, the whole idea might be an Edsel.

Previous attempts to involve viewers more directly in movies have generally failed miserably.

The most successful has been 3-D, but it remains an optical novelty, while such inventions as Smell-O-Vision, Sensurround, Percepto and Illusion-O had shorter film careers than Mariah Carey.

Smell-O-Vision, a process that pumped odors into theaters through an elaborate system of plastic pipes, was used just once, for Jack Cardiff's 1960 "Scent of Mystery." On cue, up to 30 different odors — from bread and bananas to garlic and gun smoke — were released at each viewer's seat. They weren't amused, and Smell-O-Vision's chief investor, Michael Todd Jr., lost a fortune.

Percepto, an invention used by exhibition hustler extraordinaire William Castle on his 1959 horror film "The Tingler," was a less expensive failure. When characters let out screams in the movie, some viewers did, too, thanks to electrical buzzers that zapped them in their seats.

The next year, Castle tried Illusion-O for the movie "13 Ghosts." This time, audiences were provided devices similar to 3-D glasses that allowed them to see ghosts that were otherwise invisible.

Sensurround was far more ambitious but equally doomed. It involved placing 1,600-watt bass speakers around the theater. Cued to action in the film, the speakers literally shook the audience up. While testing Sensurround before its 1974 debut with "Earthquake," plaster was jarred loose from the ceiling of Hollywood's famous Grauman's Chinese Theater, compelling management to suspend a net over the audience's heads for the run of the movie.

Four more pictures, including the World War II epic "Midway," were released in Sensurround, but complaints from viewers who didn't appreciate being shaken out of their seats in adjacent theaters convinced exhibitors to give it up.

Sony's yet-unnamed process sounds more like science fiction than research and development. But we have to be diligent. If Hollywood is ever able to zap viewers with an ultrasound wand and make garbage smell like roses, that's all we'll ever see.

Trio in desert make 'Sahara' hot at theaters

By Mike Szymanski
Zap2it.com

They all knew they had to become close for the big-budget movie "Sahara."

After all, Matthew McConaughey's character has known Steve Zahn's character since they were 6.

"These guys have been together since kindergarten, which is kind of crazy," Zahn says. "I mean, that's like beyond married."

And then, Penelope Cruz's character falls in love with McConaughey's roguish Dirk Pitt, and the trio unites as a team of reluctant adventurers.

What no one planned for is that the two actors would actually fall in love off-screen, too.

"I think it was unexpected for everyone, especially them," says director Breck Eisner about McConaughey and Cruz. "It wasn't 'til we were done that I learned about it. I love it. They seem so happy together."

The director points out that his stars' relationship may not help the movie at the box office. "Often it hurts," he notes. "I doesn't drive people to the movie if they're not interested."

Cruz remains careful about discussing her new relationship — having already been through a media whirlwind after her fling with Tom Cruise just after he split with wife Nicole Kidman. She never met McConaughey before filming, and she says she was captivated by his sense of humor.

"I think that he's the perfect person to play this character because he has a charm that the character needs to have," Cruz says. "On the set, it was the three of us together everyday for five months. We laughed a lot, but we had to be very focused."

The actors each have their favorite moments while filming in Morocco. Cruz taught the guys some Spanish — especially swear words — and says, "We played a lot of charades." McConaughey recalls strumming his guitar around the campfire as desert nomads joined them. Zahn says he enjoyed the competitive nature between them as they learned tricks from a Navy SEAL instructor.

"We knew that you couldn't rely on some computerized wizardry, you had to believe these people and their friendships," says Zahn. "Sometimes you see friends do movies and they don't seem like friends. It's some weird artistic thing that happens."

"Sahara" is based on treasure-hunting characters in Clive Cussler's series of books. The guys are looking for a Civil War battleship, which they find in a West African desert, and along the way they meet a doctor, played by Cruz. Bad guys are constantly shooting at them, and they don't always know why, so they're always on the run.

That caused a few scrapes for the stars.

"One time I ripped my calf muscle pretty bad, I was running across this gully to get away from a sniper," Zahn says, rubbing his leg.

"I had to learn how to ride a camel," adds Cruz, who was scared of the big animals at first. "I ended up galloping next to a train at 40 kilometers per hour. I became best friends with my camel."

The director confirms: "Of the three, she was the best rider. She didn't want to stop."

Eisner is the son of former Disney chief Michael Eisner, and this is his first major film. His challenge was to make the characters connect.

"They hung out in London for a week going to bars and hanging out socially, which was important," he says. "Then they came to Morocco a few weeks before we began shooting to do military training, so they had that background together. They just love each other and have a shorthand with each other, and that translates to the screen."

The cast and crew faced treacherous sandstorms and sweltering heat as well as locusts (visible in the final scene) while shooting. But the cast took it in stride, and the three stars often high-fived each other after making it through another day on the set.

Connerty the heart of UMass

demanding and potentially frustrating assignment.

Naturally, not only does Connerty embrace the challenge, she thrives on it. She loves her underclassmen's endless amount of energy and fight and even uses it to keep her going on those exhausting days. She'll admit it can be frustrating at times, but also knows that once her young proteges come of age, the benefits will be well worth the struggles.

"Being a leader, it's easy because they're so excited to learn new things," Connerty said.

And if the rookies can play with a little more consistency by Atlantic 10 tournament time, Connerty's team will be a dangerous one.

Still, don't be fooled by Kerri's pleasant words and sweet demeanor. She wants to win; in fact it is the sole thing that motivates her and she seems poised to do anything it takes to do so, whether it's scrapping for a groundball, pumping up a teammate with cheer or gracefully weaving and cutting towards the cage for a much needed goal.

Kerri also attributes a lot of her inspiration and success to teammate, roommate and fellow leader, Jackie Nesbit.

"I'd say my roommate Jackie Nesbit [pushes me the most]," Connerty said. "I look to her if I'm down or anything. I think she's also a spark on the team, and I definitely look to her to keep me fired up. She's the same way I am; she'll come up big with a ground ball then psych everyone up.

"I look to her to maintain composure and excitement. She's an emotional leader. We're very much on the same page as emotions, so I look to her if mine are a little out of whack."

The similarities between the two force them to keep up with each other and constantly play as hard, or as well, as possible.

Just as it looks from the tin Garber Field bleachers, it comes easily for Kerri, not in the sense that she got where she is without hard work, in the sense that leading on and off the field is just part of who she is.

Connerty inspires. Her words are serious, confident and honest. And, startlingly, you learn all of this the first time you meet her, but her coach of three years rightly sums Kerri up as a player and a person.

"Kerri is passionate, she cares, she's a serious person, a natural leader, definitely a motivator, one who inspires, one who people can look up to and want to be like. She's consistent, and she cares about her teammates and team, and her performance day to day. She'll do great things beyond lacrosse in life."

The Minutewomen are struggling, which is to be expected with all of their youth. Yet, they are still full of hope and much of it. Not all of it, as she'd say, but a lot can be attributed to the commitment, ambition and character of Kerri Connerty.

Minutewomen drop two over weekend

well against Duquesne in the first half and even in the second half. They did some good things. It's a lot of game situations. In the second half we draw control and fast breaks."

The Duquesne game was much of the same for the Minutewomen. After Duquesne took a 2-1 lead early in the half, UMass riled off four straight goals to take 5-2 lead midway through the first half. The Minutewomen led the Dukes 6-4 at the half after playing well in the first half against a tough team for the second game in a row. The second half, again, was a different story.

After taking a 7-4 lead with a goal by freshman Jeanette Villapiano five minutes into the second half, the Dukes scored four straight goals to take an 8-7 lead. After a goal by Typadis to make it 9-8 UMass, Duquesne again scored four straight to take a 12-8 lead and all but put away the Minutewomen. UMass would score two more to make it 12-10 before the Dukes tossed in the final goal with just seconds left to secure the win. Bolduc found the silver lining in the loss.

"Duquesne is a really physical team, and they were fouling and not getting a lot of calls in their favor," Bolduc said. "But we played well. I think they underestimated and weren't ready and prepared for us that we were really going to rally back after a couple of Atlantic 10 losses. They thought they had this game in the bag and that's what this team is about."

The second half lapses have been a thorn in the side of the UMass women's lacrosse team this year, and it has not found a solution to the problem. Halftime seems to be the Minutewomen's biggest foe, as the game break has proven to deaden the UMass intensity and provide a spark for the other team.

"I think if we didn't have a halftime we'd be better off," Bolduc said. "I think their coach got their team fired up. They ended up getting up by one and then possessed the ball and went into a stall for 15 minutes. We had to pressure out and then once we pressured out they drove and scored, so it's tough to break that once a team gets up by one like Duquesne did."

All of the singles matches that UMass won did not advance past the minimum two sets.

Spiess was able to defeat Holy Cross (6-13) junior Carrie Simmons 6-0, 6-0. Spiess was in the driver's seat the entire match, outplaying Simmons in every aspect of the game.

Pozar continued her winning ways and her bid for the A-10 Rookie of the Year by collecting her 14th singles victory this season over junior Katie Irwin. Pozar defeated Irwin by a score of 6-1, 6-1.

Holy Cross continued to be outmatched at the No. 4 slot as Johnson easily beat freshman Meg Moran 6-2, 6-1. The difference in experience between the seasoned veteran and the rookie was evident on the court.

Bartoloni's match was delayed as Holy Cross sophomore Meredith Bacon was in the W.E.B. Dubois Library apparently studying for an exam. Bacon's lack of focus could have contributed to her being handily defeated 6-1, 6-0.

The only singles loss of the day came from freshman Kristin Dipiero in the No. 6 slot. Dipiero was filling in for junior Dorothy Iwanowicz, who was absent from both the singles and doubles lineups.

"Dorothy is trying to hit her stride for the A-10s," Dixon said. "She's trying to stay focused, and she has the most aches and pains on the team so I decided to give her the day off."

The absence of Iwanowicz gave the rookie Dipiero some much needed court experience as she is the next in line to step up if any of the UMass regulars goes down with an injury.

Dipiero's match started off in her favor as she took the first set 6-4 over fellow freshman Katie Guarino. She then slipped in the second and surrendered the set to Guarino by the same 6-4 score.

The third and deciding set went into a tie-break that was ultimately taken by Guarino 10-8. Although Dipiero battled to force the overtime she struggled and showed her lack of experience in the tie-breaker.

"[Dipiero] is an excellent tennis player, and she has tons of talent," Dixon said. "But she has been able to show it yet because she just hasn't gained the maturity that she needs yet."

The Maroon and White started the match on the right foot by taking the doubles point. UMass won two of the three doubles matches.

Spiess and Pozar teamed up to take the No. 1 match by a score of 8-1. Edelstein and Bartoloni easily won at No. 2, 8-0 and junior Lesley Fisher and Dipiero dropped their match at No. 3 8-1.

Despite a strong offensive performance in their last game, the Minutemen still nearly gave away the game defensively. Their four errors on Sunday brought their weekend total during the Saint Joseph's series to 12 errors.

The Maroon and White have been struggling defensively over the course the season, as they have 48 errors as a team opposed to their opponents' total of 37.

"I expected them to play better and to play well [defensively]," Stone said. "We had a conversation with the team, and we expect more. We expect more in execution, competitiveness, focus, concentration, whatever you want to call it. We just need to step it up."

As the Minutemen prepare for the in-state tournament, the 8-7 loss suffered in the second game on Saturday was their ninth one-run loss of the season, a significant factor in their record if some of those games would have swung the other way.

ANDREW TAM/COLLEGIAN STAFF

UMass pitcher Keith Doherty has struck out 20 batters in 14 innings of work for the Minutemen this season. They take on Harvard today.

"We still need to be better," Stone said. "This past weekend, to be honest, was embarrassing. We should have beat St. Joe's three times and should always beat St. Joe's. We expect more of ourselves and not only expect it, we've got to get it. We're sometimes satisfied with doing what's expected or mediocre, but that won't work. So, that's real important."

Red Sox sign Tim Wakefield to one-year contract extension

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Tim Wakefield, the longest-tenured player on the Boston Red Sox, agreed Tuesday to a $4 million, one-year contract extension through 2006 that gives the team up to three additional option years at the same salary.

The 38-year-old knuckleballer is getting $4.67 million this year in the final season of a three-year contract. If Boston exercises its option for 2007, the Red Sox get an option for 2008, and if the team exercises the option for 2008, it also gets an option for 2009.

In each year of the deal, Wakefield could earn $1.5 million in performance bonuses and $800,000 in award bonuses.

"It takes a lot of pressure off me to be able to know that I'm going to be here for a long time and I can just go out there and do my job," said Wakefield, who is off to a strong start in his 11th season with the Red Sox.

General manager Theo Epstein said he wasn't aware of any similar contracts in baseball.

Wakefield's deal "demonstrates that both sides really wanted to keep Tim here for as long as possible," Epstein said. "A contract such as this that has a lot of club options going forward can reward Tim for his performance and reward the club by keeping him here in a Red Sox uniform."

The pitcher stressed that he wants to retire with Boston and wants to pitch for as long as possible. Other knuckleballers have pitched successfully well into their 40s.

If the Red Sox chose not to exercise their option at any point, Wakefield could become a free agent.

"If that situation arose, I don't know what might happen then," he said.

Wakefield signed with the team in 1995 while Dan Duquette was general manager. Wakefield has moved back and forth from the bullpen to the rotation. He is a six-time finalist for the Roberto Clemente Award, a community service award presented by the commissioner's office.

Wakefield is 2-0 with a 1.37 ERA in three starts this season. He is second on the team's career list with 390 appearances, third with 1,866 innings, third with 253 starts and seventh with 116 wins.

He also has 1,343 strikeouts for the Red Sox — ahead of Cy Young and behind only Roger Clemens and Pedro Martinez.

Wakefield is 116-99 with 22 saves and a 4.28 ERA for the Red Sox, and 130-111 in his career, which began with Pittsburgh.

Fenway fans facing possible charges from Boston police

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Boston police are seeking misdemeanor criminal charges against two fans who were involved in a scuffle with New York Yankees outfielder Gary Sheffield during the eighth inning of a Yankees-Red Sox game at Fenway Park last Thursday.

Police on Tuesday asked a clerk magistrate to decide whether a disorderly conduct charge is warranted against the fans, according to Officer John Boyle, a department spokesman.

Boyle wouldn't name the two fans, but Red Sox officials have revoked season tickets from Christopher House, a Boston man who appeared to make contact with Sheffield while he was chasing down a ball in the right-field corner of Fenway Park.

The team also banned a fan who spilled beer on Sheffield from buying tickets this season. The Red Sox did not release the fan's name.

The charge, disorderly person and disturbing a public assembly, is a misdemeanor.

It wasn't immediately clear if court officials at Boston Municipal Court have scheduled a date for the hearing. If a clerk magistrate decides that criminal charges are warranted, the two fans would appear before a judge.

Meanwhile, Sheffield could find out soon whether he'll also be punished for his role in the confrontation. Sheffield and his agent, Rufus Williams, planned to meet Tuesday with Bob Watson, vice president in charge of discipline in Commissioner Bud Selig's office. Williams called Boston's actions a "good thing."

House, in a statement issued Monday through his attorney, David T. Norton, said he had "no intention" of striking Sheffield and that he does not believe he made contact with the outfielder. Sheffield said he was hit in the face.

A message left at Norton's office was not immediately returned Tuesday.

On the play in question last Thursday, Sheffield was running along the 3-foot high right-field fence, chasing a hit by Jason Varitek, when House reached over it with a sweeping motion and appeared to make contact with the player.

Sheffield picked up the ball, made a shoving motion toward House, then threw it to the infield. He then turned toward House but did not touch him. A security guard jumped over the wall and stood between House and Sheffield.

her third home run of the season, increasing the UMass lead to four. Morin hit her first career homer in a doubleheader sweep against George Washington on April 9 and then proceeded to record two more since then, including the one yesterday.

A scoreless fourth inning transferred to heavy hitting in the fifth for UMass. In the first at-bat of the inning, senior Hilary Puglia put the game away with a homerun to left field, which was her sixth dinger of the season. Despite gathering the three, the home runs were hard to come by with the wind gusting towards the field in Chestnut Hill.

"The wind was really blowing into the field, but we were able to get those hits," Sortino said. "It's tough to win at home, but it's even tougher to win on the road."

The final inning of the day was a scoreless one for the Minutewoman offense, and Busa put the Eagles to sleep, despite two runners being left on base.

Contact with the ball is something that the Minutewomen have displayed thoroughly recently, with junior KJ Kelley breaking the UMass home run record last week. After her record-breaking week, where she amassed 11 doubles, Kelley was honored as the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

Amongst the rest of the A-10, many members of the UMass softball team are fairing well and leading the conference. Proctor has the highest batting average in the Atlantic 10, with a mark of .368, with Kelley second on the list. Sophomore Candice Molinari is a perfect 25-of-25 in the stolen base department, and Puglia has amounted 11 RBIs, with both of those categories leading the conference.

With three weeks left before the A-10 Championships, 14 games remain in the season. Six of those games will be against A-10 teams and 10 of them will be decided at home.

The Maroon and White will play in two doubleheaders this weekend, with the first on Friday against St. Bonaventure and the second being played against North Carolina State on Sunday. The games against St. Bonaventure, (which is undefeated in the A-10 at 6-0) will be important to the UMass season, as it has dropped three A-10 contests, including an 11-3 blowout loss against Temple on Friday.

Ahead of the Minutewomen in the conference standings are the Bonnies and Fordham, which swept UMass on Apr. 4. The BC Eagles will have its chance for retribution, as they will face off against UMass again in Amherst on May 4.

Northeastern's Ezekiel eyeing first-day NFL draft selection

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON — Throwback. The word keeps coming up when people talk about Liam Ezekiel.

"I'm old enough to remember guys like Dick Butkus and Ray Nitschke, and he's a little bit of a throwback to that type of linebacker," said Rocky Hager, the head coach at Northeastern during Ezekiel's senior year.

"He has that tough, throwback mentality," said Ezekiel's agent, Joe Linta.

It is probably the highest compliment anyone can pay Ezekiel, a four-time All-Atlantic 10 Conference player and two-time first-team Division I-AA All-American.

Now, the 6-foot-1, 245-pound linebacker has chance to become the first Northeastern player drafted by an NFL team since the Cincinnati Bengals took tight end Dan Ross in the second round in 1979. Draftboardinsider.com has projected Ezekiel to go as high as the fourth round in the April 23-24 draft. At the very least, he hopes to be signed to a free-agent contract.

"Obviously, it would be exciting to be drafted, but I am not banking on it," he said. "I'm one of those guys who would play for free if they let me. I just want to get into a camp and show what I can do."

Anyone who played or coached against him in the Atlantic 10 already knows what he can do. Ezekiel has been terrorizing the league's offenses for four years and finished as Northeastern's career leader in tackles with 489.

Now he has to prove to pro scouts and general managers that a I-AA player can compete against far tougher competition.

"The competition level isn't the same at I-AA," he said. "The exposure isn't the same."

For the past few months, he has been trying to get that exposure in other ways.

He played in the East-West Shrine game in San Francisco in January, where he had six tackles playing against mostly Division I-A players.

He then attended the Competitive Edge Sports camp in Atlanta from late January to late February to work on speed, conditioning and strength — again with many I-A players who expect to get drafted. "Pretty much all you do there is work out, eat and sleep," he said.

Northeastern linebacker Liam Ezekiel committed to the Huskies under current UMass football coach Don Brown. Ezekiel could be drafted as high as the fourth round.

He went to the NFL Combine in Indianapolis in late February with dozens of other players who expect to get shot at the pros. They don't just test physical skills at the combine, but administer psychological and IQ tests.

"Nowadays, you can't just be a physical specimen to play in the NFL," he said. "You have to have a brain to learn the complex defenses."

He also attended a Pro Day at Boston College, where NFL scouts evaluated prospects from New England colleges.

All those experiences taught him the same thing — he can compete with the best college football players in the nation, even if he did play at a I-AA school.

"I always knew I could compete with them, but I guess after doing all these things it has reassured me a bit," said Ezekiel, who has a 36-inch vertical leap, runs the 40-yard dash in 4.62 seconds and has a maximum bench press of 475 pounds.

He is also aware that some of the top players in the NFL played at I-AA schools, including Philadelphia Eagles receiver Terrell Owens (Tennessee-Chattanooga), New England Patriots safety Rodney Harrison (Western Illinois) and two-time league MVP Kurt Warner (Northern Iowa) who will play for the Arizona Cardinals next season.

Ezekiel was actually recruited by a number of I-A colleges out of Arlington High School, and committed to play at West Virginia. But he missed the Bay State and his family, and came home after just a day, before participating in a single Mountaineers practice.

Don Brown, the former Northeastern coach now at Massachusetts, had recruited Ezekiel out of high school and gladly gave him the school's final scholarship four years ago.

Hager was the beneficiary of Ezekiel's final year of collegiate eligibility, when he was named a finalist for the Buck Buchanan Award, which goes to the top defensive player in I-AA.

"When I got the job at Northeastern I talked to a couple of guys on the Temple staff who had coached in the Atlantic 10 and they told me Liam is the kind of guy you build your defense around," Hager said.

"He plays the game with a consistent intensity. In the coaching world we say he has a great motor. He does all the things you like to see from a linebacker. He doesn't run around his blockers, he holds through them. He has a nasty streak on the field, and that helps make him the prototypical inside middle linebacker in a 4-3 concept."

But Hager suspended Ezekiel indefinitely last season because of an "incident" at practice. No other details were given and Ezekiel missed only one game, against Hofstra, before Hager lifted the suspension.

Linta, Ezekiel's agent, has a track record of representing lower division players. "We've done pretty well with guys like him in the past and a lot of people in the NFL respect my opinion," said Linta, who played football at Yale. "My motto is 'We only need one team to like you.'

"Whatever team gets him will be getting a real leader and once he gets in it will be very difficult to get rid of him," Linta said.

2005 QB draft class full of mediocrity

By Bob McGinn
Knight Ridder

GREEN BAY, Wis. — There hasn't been an unmitigated bust at quarterback in the NFL draft since Akili Smith was the third overall selection by the Cincinnati Bengals in 1999.

If the Detroit Lions give up on Joey Harrington (third pick, '02) and the Baltimore Ravens give up on Kyle Boller (19th pick, '03), two more quarterbacks who were handed starting jobs by default will go down as failures.

Smith, Harrington and Boller are linked to Jeff Tedford, just about the hottest coach in the college game. The dilemma for personnel people is what to make of this year's Tedford-tutored quarterback, California's Aaron Rodgers.

Tedford worked wonders with Trent Dilfer (sixth pick, '94) as offensive coordinator at Fresno State from 1993-97. Then he salvaged the careers of Smith during the first year of his four-year stint (1998-2001) as coordinator at Oregon and Boller during the first season of his ultra-successful three-year tenure at Cal. Harrington spent four years under Tedford at Oregon.

The other quarterback whom Tedford has had drafted was A.J. Feeley (fifth round, '01). He also coached David Carr as a freshman at Fresno State when he played very little.

As much respect as NFL people have for Tedford's ability to develop winning quarterbacks on Saturdays, they have an equal degree of disdain for how his proteges have fared on Sundays.

"They all throw the ball the same way," a personnel director for an AFC team said. "What have those guys done? Nothing."

"They're all so mechanical, so robotic," another scout said. "They're so well-schooled. I think Rodgers is in that same mold."

Rodgers didn't have an offer coming out of high school in Chico, Calif., so he went to nearby Butte (Junior) College in 2002. Tedford discovered him after one season, Rodgers was able to obtain his release and he signed with Cal.

In two Pacific-10 Conference seasons, Rodgers started 21 of 25 games, completed 63.8 percent of his passes for 5,469 yards, 43 touchdowns and 13 interceptions.

Recognizing that the crop of senior quarterbacks was weak, Rodgers declared a year early and, incredibly enough, now has a chance to be the first player selected.

"I think he has a good chance of being a bust just like every other Tedford-coached quarterback," an NFC personnel director said. "Thing I struggle with is he gets sacked a lot. Brett Favre can change his release point and find different windows. This guy is very rigid mechanically."

A Journal Sentinel poll this month of 13 personnel people asked each to rank their top five quarterbacks in order, with a first-place vote worth five points, a second-place vote worth four and so on.

Utah's Alex Smith, the other big-name junior, drew 11 firsts compared to two for Rodgers and had 63 points compared to 53 for Rodgers. After that, it was Auburn's Jason Campbell with 25, Akron's Charlie Frye with 17, Georgia's David Greene with 16, Arizona State's Andrew Walter with 13, Purdue's Kyle Orton with seven and Louisville's Stefan LeFors with one.

However, one of the two scouts that put Rodgers No. 1 conceded that he wasn't in the same class of the quarterback group last year that included Eli Manning, Philip Rivers and Ben Roethlisberger.

"But if you don't have one, where do you get one?" Chicago Bears general manager Jerry Angelo said. "You can say, 'Hey, I don't want to take him here, it's too rich.' But if you say, 'I can win with the guy,' and I certainly think you can with both of these guys and maybe three or four of them, you've got to take them."

Scouts say Smith probably isn't as ready to play as Rodgers and might not have as strong an arm. However, Smith rates a slight edge on superior height and athletic ability.

"Smith is an exceptional runner, I think he's a leader and he can air it out," Tony Softli, Carolina Panthers director of college scouting, said. "He has all the skills you're looking for."

Are these two quarterbacks worthy of a projected $22 to $25 million in guaranteed money? Or are they at the top of a draft sorely lacking in genuine franchise prospects essentially because of the position that they play?

"Frankly, I don't know," Indianapolis Colts President Bill Polian said. "Am I certain Aaron Rodgers will come in and be the guy to lead my team to the Promised Land? I can't say that. I'm not even sure I can say that about Alex Smith.

"I'd stop after the top three quarterbacks this year. I think it's the Grand Canyon after that."

Rise from the bottom

Kerri Connerty is the heart of the UMass lacrosse team

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

On a crisp fall day in Amherst two and a half years ago, a freshman by the name of Kerri Connerty approached her new coach and asked her an assertive and sincere question, "What can I do to play?"

First year coach Carrie Bolduc knew that Connerty, the first freshman to approach her, would be a special player on her lacrosse team from her youthful exuberance.

Today, Connerty stands poised about 10 meters from her opponent's goal and moves effortlessly through the defense with fluent quickness and a serenity that seems to settle her team at the most critical of times. Her mouth works as quickly as her stick with words of direction, encouragement and praise.

To the observer, it can seem at times like she can score whenever she wants without any help, but that is where the true heart of Connerty's game and personality comes into play.

Yes, she leads her team in assists and points, but don't be surprised if she has no clue or if she doesn't think it's important. You hear them less and less these days in an increasingly "me-first" athletic world, but you've heard the cliches: "I couldn't have done it without the team" or "everyone played well, it was a team effort," but they rarely seem genuine or more than just said to say the "right" thing.

When Kerri Connerty says things like this, she means them and may even get pretty mad if you don't believe her.

"We have great captains that get us together," Connerty said. "All have their own roles just as I have my own role. If I have a good game or do good things, it's just because my teammates around me, they got me open, they work off ball, it's definitely not fully me."

Bolduc offers a different perspective.

"I think her work ethic and her willing to improve is just phenomenal," Bolduc said. "She, every summer, works on something new, whether it's her fitness or her quickness or speed, whatever it is. She has done things on her own to improve, and every year she comes back stronger and stronger. I think that her drive, her motivation as an individual, has made her who she is today as a player and as a person as well."

As humble and kind as Connerty is off the field, ironically it's her forcefulness and passion to be the one responsible for her team's fate that has gotten her to where she is today.

She just won't admit it.

Leading a group that has nine freshmen, Kerri Connerty has been a consumate teammate this season.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Kerri Connerty has scored 29 goals and has tallied a team-leading 11 assists for a team-best 40 points.

"I think I've just had a good season," she said. "I don't think that I work harder or do anything more than anyone else. My teammates work very, very hard, and their hard work is why I do well in games."

It almost sounds too perfect and nice to be true, but she's sincere.

Connerty isn't a leader on your typical team though; she's got much of the responsibility of bringing along an unheard of nine freshmen, which is one

UM lax comes up empty over long weekend

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team finished a two-game road stint on Sunday, in which it dropped two tight games to conference opponents St. Bonaventure and Duquesne over the weekend. The Minutewomen fell to 4-9 on the season and 1-5 in-conference.

The wins over UMass moved St. Bonaventure to 11-3 on the season, and Duquesne moved 10-2 on the year, with each team boasting a 4-0 record in the conference, making the Bonnies and the Dukes the top two teams in the Atlantic 10.

On Friday, the game started out familiar enough, and ended with what has become a common theme for this team. The first three goals were scored by UMass with the first St. Bonaventure goal coming at the 18:31 mark by Kelly Chevez.

Freshman Kathleen Typadis scored at the 17:16 in the first half to make it 4-1 UMass, before St. Bonaventure ripped off four straight goals to take a one-goal lead. The Minutewomen responded with three of their own to take a 7-4 lead into halftime. That is where it fell apart.

After the Bonnies chipped the lead down to 8-7, junior captain Lindsey Cassell scored to make it 9-7. After Cassell's goal, St. Bonaventure opened the flood gates with six straight goals, giving it a 13-9 lead. UMass answered back with three straight of its own, but it turned out to be a last-gasp effort, as the Bonnies scored the last four goals of the game to seal the deal.

The team didn't have much time to think after the St. Bonaventure game, as they were on the road to Duquesne just a day later. UMass coach Carrie Bolduc knew that the team had to recover quickly.

"Right after St. Bonaventure, they bounced right back," Bolduc said. "They performed really

Morris keeps piling up awards

What does scoring eight points, including the game-winning goal, in an all-important come-from-behind win against an ECAC opponent earn someone?

Well, it all depends on which day of the week it is.

Massachusetts men's lacrosse attackman Sean Morris scored a career-high five goals and added three assists for a career-best eight points in UMass' 14-12 victory over the Hobart Statesman on Saturday afternoon in Geneva, N.Y.

On Monday, Morris was tabbed, along with UMass softball catcher KJ Kelley, as the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week.

Yesterday, Morris was named ECAC Riddell Lacrosse Offensive Player of the Week for the second time this season. He was also recognized with the honor on March 2 after scoring a then-career-high four goals plus an assist in UMass' 18-2 3-1 ECAC) season opener, a 12-7 win at Hofstra.

Fellow UMass attacker Jeff Zywicki received the award last week for his four-goal showing in the Maroon and White's 14-6 drubbing of St. John's.

After falling behind 6-2 in the second quarter on Saturday, the Minutemen went on a 6-1 scoring run to take an 8-7 lead. Morris scored two of those goals during the run, including one in the final two minutes of the first half to tie the score at 7.

Morris also scored the 13th Minuteman goal of the afternoon, which proved to be his third game-winner of the season.

He leads UMass with 27 goals, 16 assists and 43 points through 10 games this year.

Massachusetts defenseman Jack Reid was named to the ECAC Honor Roll for keeping Hobart's then-leading scorer Nate Hill (15-15-30) pointless for the first time in nine games.

The No. 9 Minutemen take the field next on Saturday against the No. 3 Georgetown Hoyas at Garber Field at 1 p.m.

Minutewomen roll through BC

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

With the temperature at a balmy 70 degrees, the Massachusetts softball team (22-12-1 7-3 Atlantic 10) defeated Boston College 5-1 yesterday at Shea Field.

This non-conference contest was the first road game for the Minutewomen in a week and followed a doubleheader split against Temple on Sunday.

UMass	5
BC	1

The Maroon and White are scheduled to travel again this Friday, as it takes on St. Bonaventure in a doubleheader.

Against the Eagles, it was more of the same for UMass, which scored runs early and shut down the opposition's offense. The defense was led by senior Barb LaFogg, who allowed four hits and struck out four through five innings of play. LaFogg has accumulated an A-10-high 154 strikeouts this season and holds a record of 14-8.

In the fifth inning, with two on base, LaFogg was able to get out of a jam and left the game pitching five scoreless innings. Her counterpart, junior Jenna Busa, came into the game in the sixth inning to relieve LaFogg and let up two hits and one run off of an error. This marks the second save for Busa this season, who has 84 strikeouts in 23 appearances.

"Barb gave us a good appearance, and the team played good overall defense. She really kept the ball moving around,"

ANDREW TAMULYNAS/COLLEGIAN

UMass pitcher Jenna Busa recorded her second save of the season in the team's victory over Boston College yesterday in Chestnut Hill.

Sortino said. "Jenna also had a good day, with that only run coming on an error."

The group that leads the A-10 in team batting heated up early in this contest when sophomore Amanda Acampora stepped up to pinch hit for junior Kristi Stefanoni. Following a single by senior Pam Sulick, freshman Lauren Proctor doubled to right field. This set up Acampora, who homered, giving the Minutewomen a 3-0 edge in the second inning. This marks the first homerun of Acampora's collegiate career and her fifth R B I.

"[Acampora] is becoming very confident with her hitting," Sortino said. "I feel that she is finding her strength in that area of the game."

The Maroon and White did not slow down in the third, as sophomore Amanda Morin hit

Beanpot on tap for Minutemen

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team is coming off its fifth win and its best offense production of the season going into the annual Beanpot Classic. The Minutemen will face off against Harvard today at LeLaucher Field, the home of the Lowell Spinners. The game will begin at 2 p.m.

Then, the Minutemen play in one of the most historic and famous ballparks in the entire world, Fenway Park, tomorrow. Depending on the outcome of the Harvard (17-10 10-2 Ivy League) game, UMass will face either Northeastern (12-15 5-1 America East) or Boston College (23-11 9-4 Big East) in the second day of Beanpot action. The consolation game is the first game on Thursday at 2 p.m. followed by the championship at 5 p.m.

"I actually pushed if we couldn't get Fenway for both days to play in LeLaucher, which I think is a really nice ballpark," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I'm really excited about it and to get into to Fenway, that's real special."

In last year's Beanpot, the Maroon and White lost a heartbreaker when it dropped a 4-3 decision to Northeastern in the opening round. Former Minuteman starter Devin Barnett turned in a solid outing going eight innings and, at one point, retiring 14 straight batters before allowing the winning run to cross the plate on a balk.

Following the opening round loss, the Minutemen rallied for three runs in bottom of the seventh to tie Harvard, 4-4, to go into extra innings, but they had no response for Harvard shortstop Zak Frankes' three-run shot over the left field fence in the top of the eighth, leading the Crimson to a 7-4 win.

"It's a special tournament atmosphere," Stone added. "Last year, it wasn't quite the same because we were at Brockton. But this year with the incentive to playing the championship game at Fenway, it should be real."

With senior Jason Twomley continuing to play strong offensively, a few other UMass players started to break out this weekend. Sophomore Bryan Adamski had a huge weekend, going 6-for-14 with his first collegiate home run. The Tiekyo Post transfer also posted eight RBIs on the weekend after having only five total previously.

Two freshmen showed improvement during the Saint Joseph's series as shortstop Zach Thomas and third baseman Ryan Franzcek both came up with clutch hits. Thomas came up with an RBI single during a six-run eighth-inning rally. Franzcek went 2-for-2 at the plate with both at-bats coming during the eighth-inning rally.

"It's good to see the offense getting hits, but we need to be executing in a more meaningful situation," Stone said. "When we have the bases loaded or RBI situations, the guys who have shown consistency in other areas need to step up and execute. That's what it's all about."

Just another win at Boyden

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

There seemed to be a recurring theme at the Upper Boyden Courts this spring. The Massachusetts women's tennis team (15-6 4-0 Atlantic 10) just kept winning.

The Minutewomen won all of their outdoor matches in Amherst this season.

The latest victim came on Monday when UMass was able to defeat Holy Cross 6-1. The win marked the eighth in a row for the Minutewomen and their ninth win in 10 matches.

Monday was also Senior Day in Amherst as senior captain Sasha Edelstein was honored before the match for her career at UMass.

Minutewoman head coach Judy Dixon is sorry to see Edelstein go.

"She is probably the best leader I've had here, and I've been here 11 years," Dixon said before the match.

Singles wins for the Minutewomen came from Edelstein at No. 3, sophomore Michele Spiess at No. 1, freshman phenom Masha Pozar at No. 2 and juniors Susan Johnson and Jana Bartoloni at Nos. 4 and 5 respectively.

Students react to impending RIAA, MPAA lawsuits

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Students across the University of Massachusetts reacted to the lawsuits that the Recording Industry Association of America and the Motion Picture Association of America are filing against university students.

UMass Legal Services says that some of the students have already sought advice. "The recording industry is very meticulous at what they do," said Steve Mammarella, a Legal Assistant at Legal Services.

Last week, both the RIAA and the MPAA filed lawsuits against college students who illegally download music and movies on the "Internet 2 hub" (i2hub) network. The RIAA disclosed that UMass had 25 students who were being sued, while the MPAA would not release that information.

Even though college students were the targets of this round of lawsuits, RIAA CEO Cary Sherman said in an online chat that his company is not specifically after students.

"College students are not the primary target. Of the lawsuits brought to date, we've sued a relatively small percentage of students as compared to the general public," he said.

Sherman also said that his company sent out letters to 140 universities informing their presidents about the downloading problems on their campus.

Since the legal process started last week, Mammarella said that now is the time that students should take advantage of Legal Services.

Once the student has received the subpoena, they have a short period of time in which they can "quash" it, Mammarella said. Quashing a subpoena is when the student tries to say that the respective industry does not have grounds for their information—like what they have downloaded and their IP addresses.

According to Mam-marella, Legal Services has talked to some students who have received letters from the RIAA and MPAA. He said that lawsuits can demand up to $10,000 per song downloaded.

Sherman said in his Internet chat that the average user had 2,300 MP3 files and one user had 13,600 MP3's.

Many students at the university voiced their displeasure of the lawsuits as they wondered why the industries would go after college students, who usually do not have much money for a legal settlement.

"I think it's crazy," said Kyle Murphy, a senior civil engineering major. Murphy said that he didn't know that downloaded music was illegal, and that he hasn't seen any warnings in any of the programs, and that can be a cause of the problem.

"If you download Kazaa, there's no warning," he said.

Lynne Starek, a senior civil engineering major, said that she understood why the industries are going after college students.

"I can see why they're doing

Motorcyclist hit by car near Lederle

A male motorcycle driver incurred what witnesses described as minor injuries as a result of being struck by a motor vehicle yesterday afternoon, just outside the University campus.

The accident which occurred at the intersection of Governors Drive and North Pleasant Street involved the driver of a Green Ford Aerostar that contained only the driver of the vehicle, and a motorcyclist who was driving a Honda Shadow motorcycle. Police declined to identify both male drivers yesterday evening.

Police say the driver would receive a citation for the incident, though the accident remains under investigation by the Amherst Police Department.

According to a witness at the scene of the accident who asked to remain unidentified, the driver of the Aerostar was heading inbound on North Pleasant street toward campus when he failed to stop, striking the motorcycle. The witness said that the victim, who police also declined to identify, complained of back and neck pain, and was put in a stretcher before he was quickly taken to the hospital in an ambulance for medical treatment.

"He looked as though he was going to be ok," said the identified student. "He was talking, and awake, but he was complaining a lot about his back hurting so they brought him to the hospital."

The incident is one of the more serious accidents to occur on campus since 19-year-old Ciara Tran of Dorchester, Mass. was struck as a pedestrian this semester. Tran, a freshman student at UMass was critically injured in the incident.

Earlier this month, Amherst Police Department received a $12,000 grant from the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau as part of a statewide campaign to decrease the amount of accidents and incidents of aggressive driving, by increasing enforcement.

The Road Respect campaign will use the $12,000 to activate 20 extra police officers to work shifts covering only traffic violations specifically. The campaign began on April 4 and ended April 17.

Parks recognized for marching band success

By Cameron Methner
Collegian Staff

The sights and sounds of the UMass Marching Band and Concert Band come together with practice and dedication from the students. However, the leadership comes straight from the hands of their director George N. Parks.

This is Park's first job, and has been for 28 years.

Two days after finishing his graduate studies program, Parks interviewed and was appointed the director of a 350 person marching band. For George Parks, music has been an ever-present part of his life. Parks says his high school band director, Mr. Rehberg was a great influence on him.

"He was a great teacher and mentor. He put me on the track to become what I am today," Parks said.

Parks played the tuba and went on to study music education and tuba performance in his undergraduate career at the University of Delaware and graduate career at Northwestern University.

Parks led the Bands of America Honor Band, which performed in the 2005 Tournament of Roses Parade this past New Year's Day. An annual event since 1890, the two-and-a-half-hour spectacular of 50 floats, 20 equestrian

Payano avoids censur at SGA meeting

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Some members of the Student Government Associated attempted to censur President Pavel Payano last night, claiming that he has not managed the SGA office properly, and that he has passed initiatives without the consent of the Senate body.

A motion was drafted citing atlleged inefficiencies of the office use, specifically proper office supply use and the notion that the SGA as a body has been viewed as having the same agenda as other student groups like Take Back UMass and the Graduate Employee Organization — both groups in which Payano is a member.

Chair Lindsay Higgins made an announcement prior to the meeting's start declaring her dissatisfaction with the student body for assuming that the SGA is advocating for the GEO student walk-out today.

"The SGA as a whole does not approve of the walk-out," Higgins said. "We need to reach some resolution."

When a frustrated Payano addressed the Senate during his officer report, he said that seeing this motion was a "total shock."

He admitted that he spoke with Speaker Mark Morrison Tuesday night about issues concerning proper office use, however, he said that he did not expect to see a motion written.

"You are trying to censure me because I support several student groups," Payano said, "I have the freedom to address my own opinions."

Payano also said that he thought it was "weird to discuss who can print stuff and who can't."

According to Morrison, the SGA office had ordered "two boxes of paper" two weeks ago, the same time Payano was sworn in as president, and now all of the paper is gone.

Morrison accused members of Take Back UMass, the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy and GEO of using the office's printer and paper for pushing their own agendas.

"This wasn't a surpirise to President Payano," Morrsion said. "I told him that there would be a motion [yesterday]."

Morrsion also accused Payano of supporting the aforementioned student groups publically without consenting with the Senate body.

"When he is working as President, he should have the entire SGA behind him."

According to the SGA by-laws, the President holds the responsibility to maintain the office, until the executive cabinet is appointed.

Several of the senators that sponsored the censure motion added that this was not a personal attack on Payano, but rather an attack on the situation, that he happens to be residing over.

"This motion is attacking me," Payano said.

Morrison said that the basis of this motion is to distinguish Payano's involvement with these groups and the SGA.

The class boycott has been advertised throughout campus and Morrison said that he wants to reinforce that the SGA as a collective body is not supporting the walkout.

The alleged printing use was of fliers and signs promoting the walkout.

The vote to place the motion onto the agenda, failed, however, and the vote of censuring was never voted on. There is however, according to Senators a chance that the motion will be approved in committee meetings later this week.

In other order of business, Senator Sean Bliss announced that the pilot plan for the reverse vending machines is underway.

Two machines would be located in the Southwest Residential Area next fall and students could recycle cans and bottles, redeeming the money on their U-Cards.

"We hope that this pilot is successful so we can get more of these [machines]," Bliss said, "It would be really awesome if it could be turned into a student-run business."

Two executive Cabinet members were voted into the SGA last night. Tru Lang was appointed to the office of the Secretary of Registry and Miraisha Leiblum was appointed to the Secretary of Public Policy and Relations.

Harvard Square murder trial hears closing arguments

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — Three small-time gangsters and a heroin junkie made up "a killing team" that must be convicted for stabbing and beating to death a 21-year-old homeless woman on a Boston rail bridge, a Suffolk County prosecutor told a jury Wednesday.

In his closing argument, Patrick Haggan said victim Jo Nachtwey was terrified as they drove to the bridge because she knew the men planned to kill her. She first tried to jump from the moving car and then agreed to have sex with the gang leader in the desperate hope he'd protect her, he said.

But the three men had already decided to murder her to send a message to a rebellious faction of their fledging gang, Haggan said. They got a drug addict to do the actual stabbing by threatening to kill him, as well, he said.

"This was a cowardly, vicious and senseless murder and each and every one of the defendants wanted it to happen or chose to allow it to happen," Haggan said. "The time for accountability is now," he said.

The jury was expected to begin deliberations on Thursday morning after more than six weeks of testimony, said David Procopio, a spokesman for the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office.

Ismael Vasquez, 27; his brother, Luis Vasquez, 23; Harold Parker, 31; and Scott Davenport, 31, are all charged with first-degree murder in the death of Nachtwey, a native of Hawaii who hung out in a section of Harvard Square called "The Pit" with other young drifters and homeless, some of whom the gang leaders tried to recruit to steal for groups, and 25 marching bands puts all other parades in the shade. As Parks says, "For college basketball, it's the Final Four; for pro football, it's the Super Bowl; for bands, it's the Rose Parade."

The Honor Band is made up of a select 330 high school students from 206 different schools and 42 states.

"They were excellent players and I enjoyed being involved with kids of that caliber," he said.

Parks works with Bands of America, specifically their Summer Leadership Programs, which is why they chose him to lead the Honor Band during the parade.

For the better part of 2004, Parks was involved in preparing the band to perform in front of millions of spectators and millions more through television.

"To have the Honor Band on National Television and to hear UMass announced too was amazing," he said.

Parks took the students through a five-day "crash course" where they learned the parade route, worked on playing as an ensemble and playing together. A week in advance they received the music so that they were able to play when they traveled to California; they also were sent videos that demonstrated the basic moves and styles to follow. Parks and ten or so band members made the video last summer.

Working with students for so many years Parks has come to realize that it takes a great deal from both him and the students to make a great marching band.

"I expect a very high effort, and they put so much into playing well," he said.

Jen Warner, a UMass junior who has been playing flute in the marching band since freshman year says that, "He lives and breathes marching band. He is inspirational, energetic, and he loves what he does."

Parks brings a sense of honesty to conducting and expects the same from his students. But for Parks it is all in how you say it.

"You would much rather be destroyed by false praise, and to be real honest I would rather give false praise. Brutal honesty is important but it is all about tone. You need good tone to play in and conduct a band," he says.

"Parks has been recognized as an astounding band leader," says UMass News Spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski.

"From the university's point of view Parks is one of the most effective, enthusiastic, and visible ambassador for the university."

Minuteman Band Director George Parks sits in front of the Louis Sudler trophy, the top collegiate marching band award in the country.

Parks has won many awards for his dedication. These awards include the Massachusetts Conductor of the Year Award and the University's own Chancellor's Medal for Distinguished Service.

"You show people that you're good, you don't say it," he said.

Murder places Deerfield on edge

DEERFIELD (AP) — A pregnant 21-year-old gas station clerk killed on the job was strangled, and the store's cash register is missing, authorities said Monday.

Brandy Waryasz, of Turners Falls, was found lying on the floor by a customer who came into Deerfield Sunoco Service Station at about 6:45 p.m. Saturday, Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth D. Scheibel said. The customer called 911, and Waryasz was brought to Franklin Medical Center in Greenfield, where she was pronounced dead on arrival.

Scheibel said Monday that an autopsy showed Waryasz was strangled. She said there were no suspects in Waryasz's slaying, but authorities were following leads.

Waryasz's death is the first homicide in Deerfield in about 30 years.

them.

Prosecutors said Davenport stabbed Nachtwey a dozen times, then Luis Vasquez cracked nunchucks on her skull to silence her screaming. They then allegedly rolled her body into the Charles River.

Haggan said Nachtwey was chosen for execution in part because her boyfriend led a revolt of the gang recruits who refused to steal after the boyfriend questioned whether the gang leaders were frauds, and also because she was left behind when the others were sent out to steal. "They took the easy target, the easy prey," Haggan said.

Earlier Wednesday, Davenport's lawyer asked the jury for a "merciful verdict" of innocent for his client. In his closing, John Courtney said Davenport hooked up with the others earlier only because he knew they could get him heroin, then drove with them to Boston because he was too high to take his car himself.

Harold Parks looks over his shoulder while examining photographs of clothing which police say has bloodstains.

Davenport didn't even know Nachtwey when Ismael Vasquez and Parker said they'd kill him if he didn't stab Nachtwey, Courtney said. "Scott Davenport was put in the position of having to decide whether he lived or he died," Courtney said. "They took Scott Davenport and said, 'You're going to kill for us.'" But Parker's lawyer said Davenport was trying to deflect the jury's attention from the fact that he was Nachtwey's killer.

During closing arguments, defense attorneys also attacked the two key prosecution witnesses, Ana White and Lauren Alleyne, both 21, who avoided life in prison when they pleaded guilty to helping to kill Nachtwey by holding her down as Davenport stabbed her.

it. College kids are major offenders," Starek said. "However, we're not the people to sue."

"I wouldn't even know it was illegal," she said, adding that she thought it was okay to use programs like i2hub.

"I don't think that it's fair that they are actually trying to get money from college students," said Youri Zabbal, a linguistics graduate student.

"There isn't an easy answer," he said. "The whole thing is a mess to begin with."

Alex Borcau, a senior communications and Spanish major, said that she thought that students could use a monthly service to download their songs.

Borcau's idea is one that Sherman agreed with in his chat.

"So far, 44 schools have done deals with legitimate online music services so they can offer their students a legal way to get music," he said.

Mass. population on the decline, study says

By Matt Apuzzo
Associated Press

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — New England stands to lose about 20 percent of its congressional seats over the next quarter century as political power follows population booms in the South and West, newly released census data shows.

Population projections released Thursday by the U.S. Census Bureau project much slower growth in New England. They also paint a picture of a region that is increasingly elderly, especially in Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine, where statisticians expect a dramatic spike in the number of residents over 65.

If the projections hold true, Massachusetts would lose two of its 10 congressional seats, Connecticut would lose one of its five and Rhode Island would lose one of its two, according to an Associated Press analysis of the data.

That diminished political clout threatens to make it harder for New England lawmakers to push regional issues such as transportation and home heating costs onto the national agenda.

The states also will have to grapple with how to afford the costly social services required by their aging population. Experts say lawmakers won't be able to rely on Washington to fund those programs, as states around the country jockey for money to deal with aging baby boomers.

The Census Bureau projects that by 2030, 26.5 percent of people living in Maine will be over 65, a percentage that would trail only Florida's projected 27.1 percent.

"That means more concerns about budget pressures for health care, more concerns over rising housing costs when it's already getting difficult to add to the supply," said Jeffrey Carr, the state economic forecaster in Vermont, which is projected to see a 149 percent increase in the number of residents over 85 years old. "There's a million ramifications to this."

The federal government allocates seats in the House of Representatives every 10 years based on census data. Massachusetts lost a seat in 1980 and another in 1990 and Connecticut lost one in 2000.

Schools suing feds for underfunding ed programs

By Ben Feller
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's largest teachers union and school districts in three states are launching a legal fight over No Child Left Behind, aiming to free schools from complying with any part of the education law not paid for by the federal government.

The lawsuit, expected to be filed Wednesday in the U.S. District Court for eastern Michigan, is the most sweeping challenge to President Bush's signature education policy. The outcome would apply only to the districts involved but could have implications for all schools nationwide.

Leading the fight is the National Education Association, a union of 2.7 million members that represents many public educators and is financing the lawsuit. The other plaintiffs are nine school districts in Michigan, Texas and Vermont, plus 10 NEA chapters in those three states and Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Utah.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, as the chief officer of the agency that enforces the law, is the only defendant.

The suit centers on a question that has overshadowed the law since Bush signed it in 2002: whether the president and Congress have provided enough money.

The challenge is built upon one paragraph in the law that says no state or school district can be forced to spend its money on expenses the federal government has not covered.

"What it means is just what it says — that you don't have to do anything this law requires unless you receive federal funds to do it," said NEA general counsel Bob Chanin.

"We want the Department of Education to simply do what Congress told it to do. There's a promise in that law, it's unambiguous, and it's not being complied with."

The plaintiffs want a judge to order that states and schools don't have to spend their own money to pay for the law's expenses — and order the Education Department not to try to yank federal money from a state or school that refuses to comply based on those grounds.

Spending on No Child Left Behind programs has increased 40 percent since Bush took office, from $17.4 billion to $24.4 billion, federal figures show. The Bush administration has repeatedly said schools have enough money to make the law work.

Yet the suit accuses the government of shortchanging schools by at least $27 billion, the difference between the amount Congress authorized and what it has spent. The shortfall is even larger, the suit says, if the figures include all promised funding for poor children.

The suit, citing a series of cost studies, outlines billions of dollars in expenses to meet the law's mandates. They include the costs of adding yearly testing, getting all children up to grade level in reading and math, and ensuring teachers are highly qualified.

To cover those costs, the suit says, states have shifted money away from such other priorities as foreign languages, art and smaller classes. The money gap has hurt schools' ability to meet progress goals, which in turn has damaged their reputations, the suit says.

Plaintiffs include the Pontiac School District in Michigan; the Laredo Independent School District in Laredo, Texas; the Rutland Northeast Supervisory Union in Brandon, Vt.; and six of the school districts that are part of Rutland Northeast in south central Vermont.

Moussaoui's guilty plea could bring death penalty

By Mark Sherman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person in the United States charged in connection with the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, plans to plead guilty to charges that could bring him the death penalty, officials said Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema scheduled a hearing Friday in Alexandria, Va., at which Moussaoui is expected to plead guilty to all six counts of a federal indictment first filed against him in December 2001, the officials said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the judge has ordered both sides not to discuss the case publicly.

The government has charged Moussaoui with being part of an al-Qaida conspiracy to commit terrorism that included the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon that killed nearly 3,000 people.

Moussaoui, a French citizen, could face the death penalty, although his sentence would be determined in a separate legal proceeding that would follow any plea. Federal prosecutors plan to pursue the death penalty at that time, said one of the government officials.

Moussaoui attorney Frank Dunham Jr. said he would not comment.

The case has been marked by delays, protracted arguments over access to al-Qaida members in U.S. custody and erratic, belligerent communications from Moussaoui himself. Moussaoui tried to plead guilty in 2002, but took the plea back a week later.

The indictment accuses Moussaoui of conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism, commit aircraft piracy, destroy aircraft, murder government employees and destroy property. The first four charges carry a maximum sentence of death.

Brinkema met with Moussaoui on Wednesday, the government officials said. After the meeting, the court issued a statement saying she planned to accept his guilty plea.

Lawyers who have followed the case said Brinkema's decision to accept Moussaoui's admission of guilt would hinge on whether she believed he is mentally competent to make the plea, which his court-appointed lawyers have opposed.

The trial has been delayed three times. Last month, the Supreme Court declined to review an appeals court ruling denying Moussaoui direct access to three al-Qaida witnesses, who he said might support his contention that he was not involved with the Sept. 11 planning. The court also allowed the government to seek the death penalty.

Eliminating a trial would spare Brinkema the difficult task of working with prosecutors and defense lawyers to craft unclassified summaries of statements by the three al-Qaida prisoners — the compromise courts created to allow Moussaoui some access to their testimony.

17 detainees released from Guantanamo Bay Navy base

By Paul Haven
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Seventeen Afghans came home Tuesday in one of the biggest known releases from the U.S. jail at Guantanamo Bay, and one quickly accused the U.S. military of abusing him despite warnings from a senior Afghan official to keep quiet about any complaints.

A Turk suspected of ties to al-Qaida was also freed from Guantanamo and sent back to Turkey.

The releases lowered the number of detainees classified as "enemy combatants" at the U.S. Navy base on the tip of Cuba to about 520 from about 40 countries, a Pentagon spokesman, Maj. Michael Shavers, said.

The detention center has drawn strong international criticism, and U.S. court rulings have chipped away Bush administration rules that denied the prisoners many legal safeguards. Some freed detainees have charged they were mistreated and tortured, and multiple investigations are looking into abuses at detention camps in Guantanamo and Afghanistan.

The detainees include suspected Taliban and al-Qaida members captured during the U.S.-led invasion toppled the repressive Taliban government in late 2001.

Shavers said the 17 Afghans and the Turk were cleared of suspicions of terrorist links during a tribunal review process that ended recently. Five others cleared in late March already were sent home and 15 more are awaiting transfers.

"We're always looking at opportunities to transfer additional individuals," Shavers said when asked if more releases were expected.

Year-long investigation results in arrests from Internet drug ring

By Mark Sherman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Twenty people in the United States and abroad were arrested on charges they ran Internet pharmacies that illegally shipped narcotics, steroids and amphetamines to teenagers and other buyers around the world, federal authorities announced Wednesday.

The arrests were the result of a yearlong investigation by six federal agencies of online pharmacies that often operate in the shadows of the Internet, with no fixed address and no way to track where they are located, Drug Enforcement Administrator Karen Tandy said.

The drugs were shipped to buyers with little or no effort to verify ages or medical need, allowing teenagers or drug abusers easy access to addictive and dangerous drugs, officials said.

Tandy and officials from the FBI, Customs, the Internal Revenue Service, Food and Drug Administration and the Postal Service were to formally announce details of Operation Cyber Chase at a news conference Wednesday.

Among the organizations targeted was a Philadelphia-based Internet pharmacy that allegedly smuggled prescription painkillers, steroids and amphetamines into the United States from India, Germany, Hungary and elsewhere, repackaged them and sold them throughout the world, Tandy said.

U.S. arrests took place in Fort Lauderdale and Sarasota, Fla.; Abilene and Tyler, Texas; New York City and Rochester, N.Y.; Philadelphia; and Greenville, S.C. Authorities also made arrests in Australia, Costa Rica and India.

Defense Dept. sued by AP for documents

By Larry Neumeister
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Government documents related to military hearings for Guantanamo Bay detainees are of "urgent concern" to the public and should be released, according to a lawsuit filed by The Associated Press against the Defense Department.

The lawsuit, filed Tuesday in federal court, stated AP has been able to report only anecdotally on 558 tribunals conducted since August to let detainees challenge their incarceration at the Cuban base. The news agency said the proceedings were "unquestionably of great interest to the public."

It asked the court to order the government to turn over transcripts of all Guantanamo detainees' testimony along with written statements by the detainees and any documents they have submitted.

A telephone message left with a spokesman for government lawyers in Manhattan was not immediately returned Tuesday. The telephone of a Defense Department employee handling AP's administrative appeal went unanswered.

The news agency submitted a Freedom of Information Act request in the fall, but it said the Defense Department has refused to provide the documents and has not processed the company's appeal of the government's failure to act.

AP maintained the information was a "matter of urgent concern" as it reports on constitutional and foreign policy issues presented by the government's handling of hundreds of detainees since January 2002.

Israeli army begins Gaza move out

By Yanis Zohar
Associated Press

NEVE DEKALIM, Gaza Strip — The Israeli military began removing shipping containers from a base in the Gaza Strip on Wednesday, the army's first concrete step toward a planned pullout this summer.

A crane lifted the containers onto flatbed trucks, which drove out of the base of the Southern Brigade in the Jewish settlement of Neve Dekalim, the largest in Gaza. In all, 30 containers containing furniture, computers, weapons and uniforms were to be removed Wednesday, the army said, though the base won't be completely dismantled until the end of the withdrawal.

The equipment was removed as Israel's government considered delaying the start of the pullout by three weeks to Aug. 15. A decision is to be made by the end of the week. Both Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz have sent mixed signals on whether they favor a delay.

Sharon on Wednesday was quoted as saying that he expects Palestinians to loot Jewish settlements immediately after Israeli forces leave the Gaza Strip. U.S. officials have urged Israel and the Palestinians to coordinate the withdrawal, in part to ensure an orderly transfer of the 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza.

"Immediately after the Israeli army leaves there, everything will be looted," Sharon told senior Cabinet ministers on Tuesday, according to the Yediot Ahronot daily. The comments were confirmed by a participant who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Sharon's prediction would imply that he believes planning is futile, and that chaos would ensue in any event once Israeli troops pull out.

50 bodies discovered in Iraqi river

By Sameer N. Yacoub
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The bodies of more than 50 people have been recovered from the Tigris River and have been identified, President Jalal Talabani said Wednesday. He said the bodies were believed to have been those of hostages seized in a region south of Baghdad earlier this month.

Another 19 Iraqis were shot to death and left lined up against a bloodstained wall in a soccer stadium in the town of Haditha, about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad, an Iraqi reporter and residents said.

Talabani did not specify when or where the bodies were recovered from the Tigris. He gave the information in response to a question about the search for hostages reportedly seized from the area around Madain 14 miles south of Baghdad.

Shiite leaders and government officials claimed last week that Sunni militants had abducted as many as 100 Shiite residents from the area and were threatening to kill them unless all Shiites left. When Iraqi forces moved into the town of about 1,000 families over the weekend, they found no captives, and residents said they had seen no evidence anyone had been seized.

"Terrorists committed crimes there. It is not true to say there were no hostages. There were. They were killed, and they threw the bodies into the Tigris," Talabani said. "We have the full names of those who were killed and those criminals who committed these crimes."

In Haditha, taxi drivers Rauf Salih and Ousama Halim said they rushed to the stadium after hearing gunshots and found the bodies lined up against a wall. The reporter and other residents counted 19 bodies and said all appeared to have been shot.

Residents said they believed the victims were soldiers abducted by insurgents as they headed home for a holiday marking the birthday of the prophet Muhammad.

COURTESY CNN/SI.COM

Iraqi firefighters try to extinguish a fire after a car bomb exploded near a US convoy in Baghdad Wednesday. The explosion was just one of several violent incidents in the region over the past two days.

The reporter did not see any military identification documents on the bodies and it was not possible to verify the claim, which may have been based on a previous incidents, including one in October when insurgents ambushed and executed about 50 unarmed Iraqi soldiers as they were heading home from a U.S. military training camp northeast of Baghdad.

U.S. and Iraqi military forces had no report of any killings at the stadium.

Militant violence has surged in the past week, especially in Baghdad, with explosions often going off one after another in the morning.

The first car bomb exploded near a U.S. convoy in an area of western Baghdad where the notorious Abu Ghraib prison is located, setting an oil tanker on fire, said police Maj. Moussa Abdulkarim. Two Iraqis were killed and five wounded, said Hussam Abdulrazaq, an official at the nearby al-Yarmouk Hospital. The U.S. military had no immediate information on the incident.

The two other car bombs exploded in southern Baghdad. One missed a police convoy but hit a civilian car, killing two Iraqis and wounding four, said police Capt. Falah al-Muhamadwai. The other exploded in a parking lot near Bilat al-Shuhada police station in Dora area, wounding four civilians, said police Lt. Hassan Falah.

In Sadr city, a poor section of eastern Baghdad, gunmen in a speeding car fired on policeman Ali Talib as he walked toward his car, killing him, said Col. Hussein Abdulwahid of the local police force. In another part of east Baghdad, gunmen attacked a Health Ministry car, killing the driver and wounding an unidentified passenger, said police Col. Hassan Jaloub.

South of the city, one policeman was killed and two were seriously wounded when their patrol was hit by a roadside bomb in the town of Muwaiiha, said police Capt. Muthana AL-Furati.

On Tuesday night, an attack by a suicide car bomber near an American patrol in southern Baghdad killed two U.S. soldiers and wounded four, said Lt. Col. Clifford Kent, a spokesman for America's 3rd Infantry Division. Seven Iraqi civilians also were wounded, an official at Al-Yarmouk Hospital said.

In the southern city of Basra, Abdulal al-Batat, a former aide to Saddam Hussein's half brother, Sabawi Ibrahimal-Hassan, was killed Tuesday by gunmen outside his home, said police Lt. Col. Karim al-Zaydi.

Al-Hassan, who was suspected of financing insurgents after U.S. troops ousted Saddam in 2003, was captured in Syria and turned over to Iraqi authorities in February.

Al-Qaida in Iraq, the nation's most feared terror group, claimed responsibility for Tuesday's worst attack, a suicide bombing near an army recruitment center in Baghdad that police said killed at least six Iraqis and wounded 44.

The weeklong surge in violence comes as Shiite and Kurdish leaders try to form a Cabinet that will also include members of Iraq's Sunni minority, believed to form the backbone of the insurgency. Talibani told reporters that officials hope to announce the new government Thursday.

Business as usual at UMass

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

If you are reading this article while sitting in a classroom, then you are performing business as usual and need to get up and leave.

The same questions arise once again: why won't the GEO and those pesky activist undergraduates allow the University to function normally today? What could it possibly benefit them to disrupt the very education that they pay for? And why would the administration even care if they go have another futile protest out on the sunny grass; aren't they just tiring themselves out without carrying on a real fight?

The simple explanation is that "business as usual" has been anything but usual. Painful budget cuts, rising tuition and fees, decreasing tenure-track faculty, questionable administrative conduct toward students, faculty and student organizations, and administration violation of trust and contract with the graduate students have all characterized "usual" at the University of Massachusetts over the last couple of years.

"Usual" is both cruel and unusual, and has been for some time now. It would be pure myth to assert that the student taking of arms is either novel or vain. It is generations old and it is necessary.

Even in transient terms, it is in our interest to promote a vibrant and autonomous student life at our alma mater and thus expand University activities and its name

And yet it is also original. I expect that today will prove to be the beginning of something special. This is not a protest, but a disruption; a show of student force. It is a celebration of us, of our struggle, and of our plans for our University. I hope that today is not reactionary, for it must not be conducted simply in opposition to the attempts of others to undermine our program. Today should be spontaneous and constructive for us and move us on our own terms toward where we would like to be as a student body in control of its own present and future.

And I hope I am proven right when I say that this is not just a day of partying passed off as political, but rather the manifestation of a growing movement on the North American continent back toward active student participation in education and the conditions for schooling. Entirely independent and spontaneous such manifestations have already made themselves felt across the nation this semester, and even more so in Canada and Puerto Rico, suggesting to me that students everywhere are simultaneously becoming cognizant of both their sovereign power over the University as well as the threat posed to their freedom and education by decreasing budgets, increasing fees, and fascist top-level administrators and legislators.

Student action has been both an intrinsic reaction to these conditions as well as entirely creative and autarkic ways of taking control of our communities, with a shift from the former to the latter as activity intensifies and multiplies. And indeed, the University is much more than a place of study — it is our home and our life and our forum for socialization and formation. The mentality and structure of the school will be reflected in the attitudes and expectations of graduates, and it is thus of the utmost importance that the running of our school be based upon the respect that we demand as young, contributive individuals and our values in life outside of the University.

Today we do not conduct business as usual, and so the University does not either. If we choose instead to embark upon a journey of construction and change, then so too must the University. Our University experience is transient and yet our legacy here does not have to be. Even in transient terms, it is in our interest to support the GEO so that UMass may continue attracting topnotch graduate students to teach and thereby uphold its prestigious reputation. Even in transient terms, it is in our interest to promote a vibrant and autonomous student life at our alma mater and thus expand University activities and its name. Yet we must stand up now and decide what we want, where we must go as a student body, and for the good of future student bodies. The University will follow.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

Wrong approach to activism

Zach Oeschlegel

Typically, I like to take my tests here at UMass in relative peace and quiet. I like to sit down, answer the easiest questions first, building up a little confidence, and then finish the test on the harder questions. I like to take five minutes during the test and write nothing, and ponder the essay question for a while.

One could probably see some very visible irritation on my face when members of the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO) stormed into Herter Hall during the middle of my Soviet Russia test, and proceeded to march through the halls chanting, banging on makeshift drums, and shredding my test routine.

In vain, my professor tried to get them to shut up. He was completely ignored, as for the next couple minutes the demonstrators continued their march down the hall.

A line had been crossed. Protesting inside of Whitmore or outside the student union or outside an academic building is completely reasonable, as that is within a person's free speech rights. But when it comes down to disrupting other student's right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, by stealing valued test time that I have paid for, something isn't right.

As my professor continued to plead with them to stop so we all could concentrate, a demonstrator replied, "This is how you get a fair contract." My professor stormed back into the room disgusted.

In reality, GEO is less likely to receive a fair contract because they stormed an academic building. The idea here is to fight campus apathy towards the issues surrounding our campus, and to raise awareness for what's going on, but it's having a negative effect. I'm pretty sure there wasn't anyone in my class thinking to themselves, "Man, I'm really glad GEO is getting the word out about their contract situation."

Who does the average student think GEO is? Do they think of TA's for their Friday discussions, or people grading their papers, or do they think of crazed protestors running around their academic building? Instead of inciting more student activism, what entering academic buildings does is piss students off. Instead of gathering support for a cause, it makes students push back in a negative way. For instance, as GEO is a main force behind the class boycott tomorrow, their disruption of my class made it less likely I would show up in support of said boycott. Instead of showing students why they should support GEO, more reasons were given to continue doing nothing.

Instead of inciting more student activism, what entering academic buildings does is piss students off.

What does GEO do to get students on their side? Be creative.

Last week, there was a demonstration outside by the student union which included a mock soccer game pitting students versus the administration. There was a play by play announcer describing the action as the "administration" decided to cheat during the game by whipping out tasers (actually a can of silly string) and shocking the team of students.

Most students who saw that, whether they agree with the demonstrators or disagree, found it to be pretty funny. Why settle for typical rallies, marches, and the like when you can think outside the box and get people's attention in ways that aren't so normal? Why does a successful demonstration have to be a loud one, too? Why do people have to be disrupted to get attention?

It's foolish to think getting people angry will make them angry for your side. Then again, as the argument follows, it's not GEO's fault they had to storm a few academic buildings. They did it because the administration is giving them a bad contract, so GEO is free to pass the blame for their obnoxious actions onto Gargano and Lombardi. Using that line of thinking, we could just go into any store we like and steal, because it's the state's fault for making us so poor from these high tuition payments.

The problem with the demonstrations on campus is how they alienate so many people afterwards. It's difficult to put on an impressive demonstration without doing so, but it's a goal worth having. In tomorrow's boycott, demonstrators cannot have a "with us or against us" mentality, especially with students who don't skip class. This isn't going on strike, with anyone who does break the proverbial "picket line" becoming a scab. GEO and other organizations shouldn't need to steal other student's tuition money simply because they're not happy with their own financial situation, either. I'm hoping tomorrow's boycott reflects that. Sometimes, all students want to do is just go to class.

The subtle whispers of Italy

World Perspectives

Paige Cram

As my time in Italy comes to an end, I've found myself frequently in the position of trying to sum up a semester — or really, a lifetime — worth of experiences in a single statement. Questions like "How was it?" or "What was your favorite part?" are common and also unfathomably difficult to answer. How can I possibly recount the past four months of my life in answering such a general question?

No one will ever be able to understand the essence of this country without living here, and unfortunately not everybody gets the incredible opportunity with which I have been blessed. With that in mind, explaining a semester in Italy with something like, "it was great," or "I really liked (insert generic monument here)," seems like an injustice to those who are unable to experience it themselves. But the only way I can even begin to describe what it is like to be here and what this trip has meant to me is by letting the things that I will miss most speak for themselves.

I live in an apartment with three other students right in the historic center of Florence. Nestled between the second largest church and the largest museum in the city, our neighborhood is both lively and touristy. Since the weather turned warm, everyone who makes money off of these tourists has been out full force.

There are street vendors and gypsies that tend to annoy even the foreigners, but the street musicians perform an invaluable service. They don't play guitars like the homeless people you see in New York subways; they play violins, stand-up bases and of course the traditional mandolin. The result is this incredibly quaint, distinctly European sound: a combination of strolling down cobblestone streets, boat rides on the river and candlelit dinners. These musicians can be heard all over the city at various times of day, but every afternoon, there is a group that performs the only tune they seem to know right down the street from our apartment. And every afternoon my roommates and I gather around a bottle of wine and open the window to allow the music to float freely in and act as a soundtrack to our daily adventures. I've lately found myself humming that familiar tune and can only hope that my memory will serve me equally as well when I return, since none of these artists would ever dream of selling CDs.

Living in a city, there is always something happening at all hours of the day and night. It's no surprise that we hear sirens constantly: police sirens, fire sirens, ambulance sirens. But even that sound reminds you that you are no longer in America; you are in a place that is extremely proud of and likes to remember its past. Every siren sounds just like those in old fashioned movies, the ones that take you back to the time of World War II. There's something decidedly romantic about the old-fashioned blare that we hear from morning 'til night. It's easy to imagine all the great writers, historians and scientists of that time listening to that same sound as they went about their daily lives here in Italy.

Mandolin music, old-fashioned sirens, church bells and the constant opening of wine resonate all over this country ... this is what it's like to be in Italy.

It's no news that Italy is a mostly Catholic country and therefore has churches on every corner. And to every church, there is a bell tower. Every hour, on the hour, the bells of the city ring out in unison, and because of their large number, there is no escaping the sound. There are five churches right near my apartment, and every morning their dinging and donging finds its way into my dreams and I eventually awake to be greeted by their echo. The bells are the first thing I hear in the morning and usually the last sound I hear before I fall asleep. It's a noise I have gotten so accustomed to that I think, from now on, it will feel incredibly silent to live anywhere else.

Italy is the number one producer of wine in the world, so naturally, drinking wine is part of immersing ourselves in the culture here. The sound of the wine cork popping and the gentle gurgling of the wine when it's first poured have become all too familiar to us, and while I'm sure wine bottles make the same sounds in the States, the atmosphere will be altogether different. Those sounds, combined with all the others, make having a bottle of wine with my roommates a complete experience, not just a daily activity.

My entire semester here and the true spirit of this country can only be summed up by these sounds; it's the quintessential romantic experience. You appreciate every breath of air here and every second that passes because everything is so incredibly beautiful that it literally takes your breath away. Mandolin music, old-fashioned sirens, church bells and the constant opening of wine resonate all over this country ... this is what it's like to be in Italy.

That has been my favorite part about living here: the food is incredible and the people are endlessly entertaining, but the small ways in which this country speaks to you are what I will miss the most. The way it gently whispers to you of its history, its desires, its passions and its hopes, ever so subtly, so that you'll only catch it if you're paying attention. Luckily, for the past four months, I have been.

Just call me 'Golds'-member'

Matt Brochu

Much like the enemy dojo in "The Karate Kid," the Freshmen 15 strikes first, strikes hard, and shows no mercy. Fortunately those 15 pounds never found me ... at least until this year. It was no time at all until I found my solution: the as-seen-on-TV "Fitness Made Simple" videos. But then it hit me. Why would anyone pay money to look like "Fitness Made Simple" guy? He looks like he jumped right out of the "Thriller" video. So I joined Gold's Gym instead.

Keep in mind, Gold's isn't like most gyms. Most gyms have water fountains that smell like boxer briefs and bong water. Gold's gives out Poland Spring water bottles upon entry. Most gyms have an unqualified, unapproachable staff. Gold's has a qualified staff that I would approach one-by-one at McMurphy's if I were single. Most gyms make their playlists by taking good bands and playing their best songs. Gold's makes its playlist by taking mediocre bands and playing obscure songs from their somewhat unsuccessful sophomore albums.

Listen up, Gold's Gym of Amherst. All in all, you have an excellent facility with excellent equipment manned by an excellent staff that does everything in its power to keep me trim, toned, and tempted to touch at all times. But here's the thing — roughly 25 percent of the people who attend your gym suck.

There's no reason to freak out just yet. All you need to fix this problem is to follow the lead of Fenway Park. Although the customer is always right at friendly Fenway, if a fan reaches onto the field of play and slaps an opposing player (threatening to mess up his stupid little mustache), his season tickets are immediately revoked. Similarly, if a Gold's Gym member does something that annoys Matt Brochu in an Old Navy commercial sort of way, then he/she should be ejected and banned from the premises immediately. The following offenders fit this description:

If a Gold's Gym member does something that annoys Matt Brochu in an Old Navy commercial sort of way, then he/she should be ejected and banned from the premises immediately

Notebook-carriers

We get it. You're committed to obtaining the maximum workout whenever you lift, but is the Trapper Keeper really necessary? If you need to carry a notebook around at all times to tell you what to do, that's your choice. But let me be the first to wish you luck on maintaining a serious relationship because if you can't remember how many sets of incline flies you did on Thursday, there's no way in hell you're going to remember the date of your anniversary.

Unnecessary tattoos

Most tattoos have one thing in common with sexually transmitted infections: they happen after one too many shots of Jäger, but that's not the case for you guys. It's pretty obvious that the inked trail of barbed wire encircling your biceps was planned way back when "No Fear" T-shirts were cool, but did you ever stop to think about what it may look like 40 years down the road? Just ask the naked old dude in the locker room who had a mermaid and the name of his girlfriend, Fran, tattooed on his right arm after the war. Nowadays, if you look really closely, you can barely make out a bloated manatee named Fart that jiggles when he dries off his back after a shower.

But guys aren't the only ones at fault here. Granted, I'm a huge fan of feminine lower back tattoos, but girls should stay away from ancient Chinese characters at all costs. Nothing against China, but if Tammy the Tattoo Artist tells me she failed out of New England Tractor Training School, there's no way I'm going to trust her to put the right symbol on my back. It's a disaster waiting to happen. One day you're running around telling all your friends that your new body art means "Spiritual Happiness," and the next day you're running off to get it removed because a good Samaritan was nice enough to tell you that the array of lines and zigzags stenciled above your hot pink thong is a billboard that actually says "Slept with 100 Men." Fat guys who don't do cardio. Props to you for working out in the first place, but there's a lot more to fitness than chest, delts, and back. Sure, most guys would be embarrassed if they could only bench press half their body weight, but in your case, it's an accomplishment.

But don't you worry, Gold's Gym of Amherst. You haven't lost me as a member. I know what brings all the girls to my yard, and you're a big part of it. I realize that some things are beyond your control. No matter what you do, some guys will continue to sound like they're giving birth to a pony while doing bench press, some girls will continue to wear unbelievably tight pants (which is like a deer wearing an orange reflective vest during hunting season), and everyone will continue to look constipated while doing shrugs.

You can, however, control the people I've mentioned above. Although making fun of them gives me something to do between sets, it's getting old.

Now if you'll excuse me, I have a tanning appointment to get to.

Seussical hops into the Student Union Ballroom

By MICHAEL BUSACK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Most people have at times questioned the limits and possibilities of life, love and imagination, but few people would have guessed that the answers to these questions can be found in the words spoken by an elephant named Horton.

The UMass Theater Guild will present some of Dr. Seuss' most ingenious, and imaginative thoughts this weekend in their production of the "Seussical the Musical."

Known by most critics for its historically horrible run on broadway, "Seussical" is the Lynn Ahrens & Stephen Flaherty musical adaptation of some of the most well known works of Dr. Seuss. While the Broadway version was a flop, Tim White, the shows producer says that it just wasn't done right.

"It didn't do well on Broadway, but that was because it is a show aimed at kids. Why would parents drive their kids all the way out to Broadway to see a show," White said. "Once it started touring it really began to pick up because more kids were able to come see it."

'Seussical the Musical'

White was elected by the Theater Guild as the producer for the 2004-2005 school year. In that time he has been responsible for the production of both "Seussical," as well as the Larry L. King's musical "The Best Little Whorehouse in Texas."

"It's been really smooth," said White about the process of creating the Guild's stage version of "Seussical." "The challenge about this show is that it is slightly an opereta. It is all basically about music."

The story is told by possibly the greatest master of ceremonies, none other than the legendary Cat in the Hat. The plot winds through many of the ideas of Seuss' most popular books, such as "Horton Hears a Who" and "Green Eggs and Ham.

While the subject matter doesn't rival that of the "Ten Commandments," the show mixes elements of whimsical music, upbeat dancing, and Seuss' eloquent, yet childlike way of expressing some of

Red Bull to host auditions for orchestra

By MICHAEL BUSACK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Red Bull isn't just a drink anymore. In fact the energy drink that has had a reputation for giving students that late night something extra is launching in to the arts.

After a recent art exhibit that explores the manipulation of the Red Bull can, manufacturers of the product will now host 60 collegiate musicians from the eastern United States in a Red Bull orchestra.

The group has titled this new group of musicians as the Red Bull Artsechro (think Orchestra backwards), and on Oct. 2, 2005, the orchestra will transform traditionally classical music in to a nightclub of sorts, complete with a DJ. The promotional group says on their Web site that "the twist in this concerto lies in its star, a very modern artist — the turntable."

But wait, before the skeptics judge this event as just another joke promotion, wait until you hear where they are going to perform. Yes, the group plans to entertain in the Mecca of Music, the Church of Classical — Carnegie Hall.

A true DJ knows that a turntable can be used as a musical instrument just the same as your average oboe or clarinet. The turntable can be controlled for pitch, variation, speed, and overall sound — this is an instrument. But just as much as every DJ may know this fact, they also must know that rarely do they receive respect for this skill because most spinning relies on spontaneity.

DJ Radar, the mind behind the turntables in the Red Bull Artsechro, searched for a valid way to communicate with his fellow musicians, but in order to do so, he had to seek the help of Composer Raúl Yáñez.

Yáñez and Radar worked together to create a composition they have dubbed "Concerto for Turntable." The revolutionary piece of work actually transcribes a turntable in to a traditional music staff system.

Red Bull is trying to attract the most innovative of musicians to perform in this event. The skill that is needed for the show to go off without a hitch is demanding because the musician needs to both have a knowledgeable love for classical musical, as well as an interest in modern music as well.

All applicants to the Red Bull Arsechro must be college students, who have the opportunity to apply through the Web site, redbullartsechro.com by both submitting a video, and filling out a questionnaire, or there is an option to apply with on site auditions. Auditions will be held at New York University from April 2-3, Julliard School on May 8, and the University of Arts in Philadelphia on April 30, and for all the UMass hopefuls there will be an audition on April 24 in Boston at a location to be determined.

In touch with Brit

The truth comes out: She's preg.

That's right, America's favorite tabloid fodder Britney Spears announced via Web site that she and her spouse, husband Kevin Federline are indeed pregnant. The post showed up on britneyspears.com on April 18, stating, "The time has finally come to share our wonderful news that we are expecting our first child together."

Looking back over the past five years of popular music it is completely undeniable that Britney Spears has had a direct and intense impact on the popular culture scene. From cola deals to shoe ads, her own fragrance, a (platinum) greatest hits CD and DVD set spanning four albums of material, and now a role as an executive producer on her new reality TV show, her presence in the pop genre is incredibly shaping.

In reality though, when she first stepped out into a high school corridor, shaking her pigtails and bottom simultaneously, she was a mere 17 years old. She quickly rose to fame, known best for her ingenious brand of image duality, a literal turn on the word re-invention. In a span of a few singles she could flip back and forth from the innocent girl next door, born and bred in the Bible-belt or a sensual, sexual being — even though she was just a girl of eighteen or nineteen.

Though this skill was Britney's greatest boon in working and planning her career, it also ensured a continuous backlash, even as her career expanded, including movies and work with major producers from every genre of music. Whether Britney claimed virginity or dressed as fashionably acceptable as she could, the subject of conversation was always about whatever provocative stunt she had most recently pulled.

The year 2004 was a whirlwind of negative publicity for the pop star. Though typically viewed in a sexy if not positive light by tabloids for the majority of her career, the pictures used of her on the cover became increasingly ugly. Where publicity stills or red carpet photos were usually used, paparazzi shots depicting her as a trashy, has-been celebrity, gaining weight and spinning out of control became increasingly common. She got married only months after annulling her 55-hour marriage to childhood friend Jason Alexander. Who was the new beau? Back-up dancer Kevin Federline, who came complete with toddler Kori and a pregnant girlfriend, actress Shar Jackson. This is certainly not the best press for Britney who was already being portrayed as living on a downward spiral.

This is when Britney got serious. After months of letting her life be painted sinful by the media she began to speak out to her fans via her Web site. She began by writing letters titled, "Truth be Told". She touched on topics ranging from her holiday activities to whatever new rumor is being run by the media.

It is a breath of fresh air that she is finally speaking up with a desire to be understood. Perhaps it will present a challenge to her artistry and force her to become more personal in her music and performance, driving her to better herself.

She is using the posts to reach out, and is now releasing her private home videos on her new show, Britney Spears might be the biggest pop star of our generation, and shes clearly desperate to talk. I think more of us should help her out and stay open to listening.

Seasonal Allergies?

By HARRY JACKSON JR.
ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

ST. LOUIS — In the spring, when young trees' fancies turn to thoughts of love, their playful pollen makes more than 40 million Americans miserable.

The first seasonal allergy outbreak of the year recently got under way, beginning the annual nine-month onslaught of pollen and mold spores. But doctors say recent developments make suffering unnecessary.

"People don't have to live with their allergies," said Dr. Raymond Slavin, director of allergy and immunology for St. Louis University School of Medicine. "There's very much that can be done, and you don't have to consider uprooting your family, leaving your good job, leaving your friends and moving to another part of the country."

A lot of people still view allergies as just a nuisance, said Dr. Leonard B. Bacharier, a pediatrician at St. Louis Children's Hospital and an assistant professor with the Washington University School of Medicine.

"People with allergies will tell you that their life is less good, their quality of life is down, they're less productive at work, they don't sleep well at night," Bacharier said.

Common allergy symptoms include a runny nose; coughing and sneezing; red, itchy eyes; hives and headaches, according to the National Institutes of Health.

A lot of folks fear that the mild winter means an intense allergy season. Not so, say doctors. Granted, it probably started two weeks early, late February instead of early March, as trees and bushes started blooming without interference from low temperatures and frost. But a longer season doesn't mean a worse season, Bacharier said.

The Midwest is in an ideal location for allergens, says Slavin. The year-round allergen, mold, grows on grains, and anyone within 200 miles gets a daily dose. Trees are a problem from about March to June, grasses from about May to August and ragweed from August to the winter. Add to this a caldron of humidity and it's an allergy sufferer's headache, literally.

Still, doctors say, the options for treating allergy symptoms have grown immensely in the past 10 years.

ALLERGY REMEDIES

The means of fighting allergy symptoms haven't changed much in the past few decades:

First, seal the house. Clean it, cover bedding with plastic, lower the humidity and pull out the carpet if you can afford it.

Use the improved allergy medicines, including antihistamines, decongestants and steroid nasal sprays.

Consider immunotherapy allergy shots designed to reduce sensitivity.

MEDICATIONS

The biggest breakthroughs in the past decade have been allergy pills and steroid nasal sprays. They work and don't cause drowsiness the way older medications do.

Terry Seaton, professor of pharmacy practice at St. Louis College of Pharmacy, Seaton suggests allergy sufferers work with an allergist to select the best drug or combination of drugs. Over-the-counter drugs aren't meant to be long-term remedies.

The antihistamines that have beaten drowsiness are Allegra, Zyrtec and Clarinex (the prescription version of Claritin), says Seaton.

Of the drugs, doctors and Seaton agreed that Clarinex is the weakest.

As for Zyrtec, about 10 percent of users still complain of drowsiness. In fact, the Food and Drug Administration doesn't allow the manufacturer to claim that it won't cause drowsiness.

Allegra, the heir to the breakthrough drug, Seldane, is considered the most trouble-free and is the friendliest with other medicines or alcohol.

Seaton said to disregard claims that a drug is for indoor or outdoor allergies, all allergy drugs fight allergies, regardless of whether the culprits are indoors or outdoors. Meanwhile, allergists are singing the praises of steroid nasal sprays. They can be used alone or with another allergy medicine. The sprays offer relief for people who can't use pills or people who need more than pills alone.

"The most effective thing you can do is combine nasal and oral antihistamines," Seaton said.

More stubborn symptoms may require a decongestant, Seaton said.

The first seasonal allergy attack has recently begun, which brings with it nine months of pollen and mold spores. Common allergy symptoms include a runny nose, coughing, sneezing, and itchy eyes.

Allegra comes in a decongestant form, Allegra D. The decongestant is pseudoephedrine, the same ingredient that's in Sudafed, the nonsedating, over-the-counter decongestant.

If symptoms are bad enough to require sleeping them off, there's still Benadryl, says Seaton. It's one of the drugs used in emergency rooms when dealing with anaphylactic (life-threatening) allergic reactions, which accounts for its designation as a "rescue" medication.

But it can make you quite sleepy. "It's also marketed as a sedative," Seaton said.

New drugs are coming along all the time to fight allergy symptoms from multiple directions. For example, there's Singulair, which fights allergies differently than antihistamines do. Also, there's a very expensive injection available for people and children who suffer allergies and asthma that cause them to be hospitalized. It's restricted because it's expensive, up to $25,000 a year.

WHAT ARE ALLERGIES?

Allergy symptoms are triggered when the immune system detects a foreign protein. The immune system is a family of killer cells and organisms normally smart enough to know when an invading protein is harmless.

However, some people's immunity family has a stupid cousin named immunoglobulin E. IgE is an antibody that likes to pick fights with harmless proteins. The IgE antibody attaches itself to what's called a mast cell, another immune-system component, and when the IgE grabs an allergen, pollen, dust-mite feces, pet dander, the mast cell secretes histamines.

The mast cell, another family member that missed a couple of days at school, thinks its protecting cells when it's actually irritating them.

The reactions of the body's tissues to the histamines is inflammation and irritation that can be mild to deadly. The deadly extreme is the anaphylactic reaction, with inflammation that causes swelling and closes breathing passages.

An antihistamine drug tries to neutralize the histamines released by mast cells. Decongestants constrict blood vessels to help dry out tissues clogged by mucous, which is why people with high blood pressure should be cautious about over-the-counter decongestants. Steroid sprays reduce inflammation and promote healing.

Eve hits six months and wants him out

Original Sin

Eve

I tend to fall into new relationships with old patterns. I don't know if I attract these men, or if I am easily smitten by this specific type. I do know that the bond seems to break over the same exact reasons every single time.

Does this mean I keep repeating the same mistakes? Or am I just overly optimistic about correcting myself? The inevitable trend begins as follows: I meet the man, I pursue the man, I get the man, and the man stays permanently. And then I break it off.

This might sound slightly harsh, however, it is what is in between that counts. With every personality (introverted, extroverted, mean, fun, high, strung, calm) there are specific flaws with the type. I am attracted to outgoing, attention-seeking, energetic, sensitive-behind closed doors-types. Unfortunately, their faults include possessiveness, jealousy, and emotional instability. Could there be a correlation between extroverted men feeling insecure? In my experience, I would have to say "yes."

Somewhere near the six-month mark, my relationships turn ugly. Either I chose to end the ugliness, or I continue to live with it until I can't bear it any longer. I believe I have just reached this crossroad now. Where do I begin?

I would like to say our relationship had always been easy until more recently. However, we were hot and cold from the very beginning. I, having anxiety attacks when exclusivity came up as topic, he, having heart attacks over my past experiences and relationship history.

He despised my past, and I feared our future.

Neither of us could live in the moment. Somehow we managed to survive through these unnecessary arguments, passing them off as typical relationship glitches, but by the end of the day they always seem to surface. "Who was that guy at the bar you were so friendly with? Who was that on the phone? How do you know him? Who are you going with and why? Why do you still talk to him if you have a history?"

I reacted angry, frustrated, and defensive toward his questions, pleading for him to understand my past is past. But he points out my past continues to live in the present. I remind him how difficult it is to avoid certain guys on campus, at the bars, or even in my classes. He continues to feel threatened, scared, and helpless over the fear that one day he will lose me.

When he describes these feelings to me, I can't help but feel surprised, flattered, and extremely annoyed to hear what he is saying. He is the type that most women and men wait their whole lives to meet: a moral, caring, nurturing character that is loyal to almost anyone he knows. He is fascinating and exciting, and he can make anyone feel loved and protected.

I would say he is a unique and incredible catch. I fear losing him. But how can an insecure guy truly believe me when I tell him this?

The answer: he won't.

And that is the center of the crossroad. He will never feel secure with me, and I will never be able to erase my past. His flaw is acceptance. My flaw? Well, I might have to say denial. Could it be that I cause men to feel this way?

Sometimes I wonder if I am too honest about my past, too open of a person, or even too friendly with my guy friends. Or could it be the type of men I am attracted to? Maybe if I dated someone completely opposite to what I know we could have a whole new set of misunderstandings. Whatever the case, I must admit that insecurity arguments are becoming a continuous, redundant fashion as with all of my past relationships. And to be quite honest, it has never been so tiring.

Wrestling a world: touching lives in need

By Dale Guldan
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

MILWAUKEE — When the world learned of the destruction left in the wake of the tsunami in South Asia, many cried for the dead and the living. Many donated money and goods. Some wished there was something more they could do to help.

But few traveled 13,000 miles to Sri Lanka to help rebuild a country whose coast was decimated by one of the worst natural disasters of our time.

When Phill Klamm, a wrestling coach at the University of Wisconsin-Whitewater, heard the news, he thought about the people whose lives had been washed away.

He and former UW-Whitewater wrestlers Matt Werner and Tony Wright created Wrestling the World (wrestlingtheworld.org), an organization dedicated to helping people in need.

This was not the trio's first charitable effort. In 2002, they helped victims of a tornado in Pierce City, Mo., bringing supplies, food and muscle.

The working group of 13 that visited Sri Lanka ranged in age from 18 to 66.

They left the United States March 16 for a 10-day trip with 1,000 pounds of supplies, gifts, computers and cash to be used in four major school rebuilding projects. After traveling for three days, the group was welcomed by enthusiastic school children at Sri Sumangala School in Weligama, who surprised the group by greeting each member with a flower lei and an hourlong program of prayer, song and dance.

With the help of local contacts, provided by Sobitha Samaranayake and Athula Gunawardena, associate professors in math and computer science at UW-Whitewater, the group continued on to Galle, Matara and Kalutara. The group is planning a return trip to Sri Lanka this summer.

Several members of the group kept journals. Here are excerpts:

Werner, 27, a physical education teacher at Milton High School: "While working at the Sambodhi home, I met and worked alongside a 16-year-old. . . . His friends called him Lucky. Despite our difficulty in communicating, we shared a common bond - we both had a love for futbol (soccer). Lucky was a great kid, worked hard and never complained. Each day he worked in his bright yellow sandals . . . he was always smiling in those sandals. On our last day working, we took a lunch break, headed to the beach. . . . We split into teams and played barefoot soccer in the hot, thick sand using those bright yellow sandals as goals."

Lindsey Thiemann, 24, fifth-grade teacher at John Muir Elementary School in Madison: "I was painting a door to the administration office and had the assistance of about 10 girls offering various degrees of 'help.' After talking about Harry Potter, our families, their free time and future plans, one girl turned to a teacher and said something in Sinhalese. I looked to the teacher for a translation and she told me, 'She said that you are the best present you could have brought.' "

Amy Roselle, 26, speech pathologist at Whitewater School District: "A smaller group of us were planning on traveling back to Matara to deliver supplies promised earlier in the week, but we had to wait to make sure everything was coordinated at Sambodhi before we left. Waiting had become an expected part of the trip, so to pass the time I tried to greet a woman standing near the bus. A simple 'hello' turned into signed communication and pictures telling the story of her daughter who was killed by the tsunami. She didn't cry or become emotional. She just wanted to share her story with someone who cared."

Blayne Roselle, 26, business analyst at Hewitt Associates in Lincolnshire, Ill.: "At several of the sites we worked at, we were greeted with flowers and huge smiles. . . . A vivid recollection was how the people felt that they deserved what happened to them. A little girl told me that they were being punished. She said it was because they were disrespecting nature and being too greedy (especially with the mining of the coral) and the tsunami was their punishment."

Willie Myers, 66, retired wrestling coach and athletic director for UW-Whitewater: "My emotions throughout the venture were high. . . . I felt God's presence. . . . I found it most enjoyable to work hand in hand, right alongside the many volunteers that came to help."

Kelsey Staudacher, 18, high school senior in Fort Atkinson: "My heart ached for the people who lost loved ones and belongings. It was wonderful, though, to help such people with amazing perseverance. We were a link in a long line of reconstruction."

Erica Leary, 18, high school senior in Fort Atkinson: "Pictures and words can in no way depict the poverty those people experienced. . . . I had no way to empathize with what they had been through, but I walked away amazed at the simple happiness and contentment they had with their few possessions."

Wright, 23, senior at UW-Whitewater majoring in art education and student assistant wrestling coach: "The work was difficult at times due to the conditions and tools that we were not accustomed to. . . . We played tag in the schoolyard and a simple high-five seemed like the coolest thing on Earth to them. . . . They were fascinated with the cameras, and we enjoyed playing back the events we just captured."

Melea Renk, 28, kindergarten teacher at Lakeview Elementary School in Madison: "I guess I had this idea of what Sri Lanka and the tsunami disaster would be like. I imagined seeing pain, hurt and sadness on their faces. I never expected to see and experience what we did."

Phill Klamm, 27: "As I look back, it wasn't the playground we built, computers we gave or even the sewage system we cleaned. . . . The biggest impact was our presence, the hugs, the sweat and, oh, the candy. . . . I eagerly look forward to this summer planning our return."

Matt Werner, former UW- Whitewater wrestler, joined with Tony Wrighi and Phill Klamm to create Wrestling the World, an organization that spends its time helping people in need all over the world.

Pick a passion and run with it

By Julie Deardorff
Chicago Tribune

Dean Karnazes has run 262 miles _ 10 consecutive marathons _ without stopping. He has raced 146 miles across Death Valley, Calif., in searing 120-degree heat. And perhaps most remarkably, Karnazes has downed an entire Hawaiian-style pizza while running, without getting indigestion.

Clearly, he is not like the rest of us.

Yet Karnazes, who recently breezed through Chicago to promote his spirited memoir, "Ultramarathon Man" (Tarcher/Penguin, $19.95), does have some insights that can help mere mortals who either want to push past their perceived limits or simply jump-start their sedentary lives.

It's true, Karnazes is a genetically gifted and dedicated athlete who can run insane distances without getting shin splints or other common injuries. But like anyone, this 42-year-old husband and father of two also faces ordinary challenges: finding motivation and time to work out, eating right, pushing through low moments in races, and balancing exercise, family and work.

"The question I always get is, 'What motivates you?'" Karnazes said during an easy 5-mile jog along Chicago's lakefront. "In that question, I hear some searching. People wonder, 'How do I get active?'"

Part of his answer is that something needs to click or resonate from within. "Whether it's a traumatic event or an inspiring book, it's got to spark a flame," he said.

Karnazes' own transformation began 12 years ago, on his 30th birthday. He had his Lexus, his corporate job in San Francisco and a depressing feeling that something essential was missing. So after a night out drinking with the boys, Karnazes decided to "live life on my own terms." He wobbled home, blew a kiss to his sleeping wife and set off for a 30-mile, all-night run. Never mind that he was wearing shoes used for gardening and hadn't logged a significant run in 15 years. "A switch had been flipped inside me," he wrote. "I was transformed from a drunken yuppie fool into a reborn athlete."

Karnazes survived the life-changing jaunt and even enjoyed the subsequent muscle spasms and inflammation. The aches and pains made him feel vibrant and alive. He has since become a fanatic, scampering up mountains and around the South Pole. He ran 100 miles to the start of the Napa Valley Marathon in California, then completed the race in 3 hours and 15 minutes. He finished a 199-mile team relay race _ as a one-member team.

What he learned from running was that pursuing a passion is more important than the passion itself. "Immerse yourself in something with heartfelt desire," he said. "Even if It's basket weaving, and do it to the best of your ability."

To start, pick something you enjoy doing. Ultrarunners are associated with pain, but these people are hooked on many things about the sport, including the euphoric feeling that a long run can bring. If it were truly torturous, they wouldn't stick with it.

Karnazes loves the simplicity of running, but he also windsurfs and mountain bikes to cross-train and relieve boredom. "Make it fun, carry a credit card and run to Starbucks for a latte, and make it a priority in your life, as important as your career," he said.

Then, use baby steps. When something that feels overwhelming is broken down into little segments, it's easier to push through. In one race, after running 155 miles non-stop, Karnazes collapsed on a curb. He had 45 miles to go but found he couldn't get back on his battered feet. When he finally lurched upright, his immediate goal became a reflector about 20 feet down the road. Then he saw a bush, 50 steps ahead. Soon he was stiffly shuffling along, as if wearing two leg casts.

"Get outside and challenge yourself," Karnazes said. "Compete with yourself to see if you can make it to a tree. Then a stop sign. Soon you'll be clicking off the miles."

Finally, never underestimate the power of your mind. Physically, Karnazes, who is now training for a 300-mile run, benefits from his near-perfect biomechanics. He also eats smart, fueling up with whole grains, whole fruits and vegetables and wild salmon while avoiding trans fats or partially hydrogenated oils.

But he learned from a junior high school coach that legs can take you only so far. "Running great distances is mostly done with your head . . . and your heart," Karnazes wrote. "If we could just free ourselves from our perceived limitations and tap into our internal fire, the possibilities are endless."

Theater Guild does Seussical

life's most complicated emotions. Through color and extravagant shapes and images, the Guild has done a remarkable job in constructing the set in a manner that is reminiscent of Seuss. In fact, the only thing more colorful then the language and imagery of the show is the scenery.

"We tried to shoot for a Tim Burton inspired theme for our set," White said. "I think it worked out well. We really only had five days to put all of it together," he remarked about the short amount of time the Guild was given for physical production of the set in the Student Union Ballroom.

The show stars only Theater Guild members including John Courtney as the Cat in the Hat, Mariidath Wilson as JoJo and Brian Kelly as Horton.

"I think it is going to go very well. The cast is unbelievable this year," White said. "It is up to par with the performance we are looking for."

As in any show, the Theater Guild had high hopes for ticket sales. White says that he has been very pleased with the group's success in this department, and believes that the performances will do well.

"Tickets are selling really fast because It is such a big show," he said. "People are calling from all over to get tickets.

The show will run tonight through April 23 with shows at 8 p.m. There will also be a special matinee performance given on Sunday, April 23 at 2 p.m.

"It's a family friendly show," White said. "I think it is something really anyone can enjoy."

Tonight the Theater Guild, a student run performance troupe, will bring it's rendition of "Seussical the Musical" to the Student Union Ballroom. The Guild has been preparing the show since February.

Atlantic 10 women's lacrosse down to two dominant teams

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Duquesne Dukes and George Washington Colonials became two of the top 20 ranked teams last week, with Duquesne occupying the No. 19 spot and GW at No. 20. Duquesne is 10-2 on the season as it has steamrolled its way through the Atlantic 10, boasting a 4-0 conference record, an eight-game winning streak, while remaining the only team without an in-conference loss.

The Dukes' only two losses have come to ranked opponents — Duke and Ohio State — and Duquesne has pulled off impressive victories, including an overtime bout with George Washington. Duquesne broke the top-20 after wins last week against UC Davis and UMass.

The game against Duquesne was George Washington's only loss against a conference opponent and only its third loss of the season as it runs a close second to the Dukes in the Atlantic 10 with an 11-3 overall record and a 4-1 record in-conference.

This year, GW is treading new waters, as it notched its first victory against a ranked opponent in the program's history, beating No. 17 Towson, 11-10 in overtime. GW will face UMass this weekend, as it plays its fifth conference game of the season and is looking to improve upon its 1-3 record against the A-10.

Like uncle, like niece

George Washington senior Laura Hostetler was awarded Atlantic 10 Player of the Week, and freshman teammate Caitlin Garman received Rookie of the Week honors. Both received the awards for their performances last week.

Hostetler tied the GW single-game record with 10 points, notching six goals and four assists on April 15 against Saint Joseph's. The next game, on April 17 versus Colgate, she became the Colonials' all-time leading scorer with a two-goal, two-assist effort.

Hostetler, who is former NFL quarterback Jeff Hostetler's niece, has posted 19 assists so far this season, a GW record, and has scored 45 goals, matching her career-high.

Garman does goalie duty for the Colonials and has performed well this season with seven wins, one shy of the single-season school record. Against Saint Joseph's on April 15, she made six saves and let up only five goals, the lowest ever in an A-10 match.

Two at the top

The A-10 conference was up for grabs at the beginning of the year, but has now cleared up a bit with two teams — George Washington and Duquesne — establishing them as the elite in the conference.

They are the only two teams with four wins in the conference and boast records that give them distance from the third place team, Temple. The Owls have been the perennial powerhouse, but have slumped back to third place after a fast start and a No. 16 national ranking.

The Owls have a 6-5 overall record and a 2-1 record in conference. The rest of the conference bottoms out with only inconsistency remaining. Richmond is 3-2 in the A-10 but 5-7 overall. La Salle is 8-6 overall but 1-3 in-conference and UMass has had tight games with some of the elite teams but has only been able to scratch out four wins. St. Bonaventure rounds out the bottom of the division with an 8-4 overall record but all of their losses have been to A-10 teams.

USC star set for draft

By John Nadel
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A year later than originally hoped, Mike Williams finally gets a shot at NFL stardom and the big bucks that go with it.

Williams was a two-time loser in 2004, first in his attempt to become eligible for the draft a year earlier than NFL rules allow, then in an effort to play his junior season at Southern California.

Despite having not played a game in over 15 1/2 months, his stock has risen to the point where he seems a lock to picked among the top 10 in Saturday's draft.

The Minnesota Vikings, choosing seventh, are a possible destination should Williams be available. After trading Randy Moss to Oakland, they have a serious need at wide receiver.

"I don't know where he's going to fit in the draft. There's a lot of people who need a guy who can score touchdowns like he can," USC coach Pete Carroll said of Williams, a 6-foot-4 1/2, 232-pounder with exceptional hands and route-running ability.

Carroll should know, having been an NFL head coach for four years before becoming the Trojans' coach in 2001.

Gil Brandt, the Dallas Cowboys' vice president of player personnel from 1960-89 and now the NFL's draft consultant, likens Williams to former Cowboys standout Michael Irvin.

The 21-year-old Williams played two years at USC, catching 81 passes for 1,265 yards and 14 touchdowns as a freshman in 2002, then making 95 receptions for 1,314 yards and a school-record 16 TDs the following year.

After a court ruled in February 2004 that Ohio State's Maurice Clarett was eligible to play in the NFL, Williams left USC, hired an agent and said he was turning pro. That made him ineligible for the Trojans.

Williams was projected as a first-round draft pick, but an appeals court overturned the earlier ruling and upheld the NFL's right to bar players who had been out of high school less than three years. That rule applied to both Williams and Clarett.

After the appeals court ruling, Williams severed ties with his agent and began the process of applying to the NCAA for reinstatement: returning to USC, taking summer classes and seeking to have his academic eligibility restored.

But the NCAA turned down his request last August, two days before the Trojans' first game of the season. Williams finished his USC career as the fourth-leading receiver in school history despite playing only two years.

"Mike is a very mature individual. He's handled the entire process very maturely," agent Tony Fleming said. "I don't think he has any regrets. I think he feels like the decisions he made, he made as an adult and he dealt with the consequences. He's taken everything in stride and kept going. I've never heard him say a bitter word."

Through his agent, Williams declined to be interviewed for this story.

Carroll said he doesn't believe the fact Williams sat out last season will affect his status.

"If Mike had broken an arm or something, it might have been construed differently," Carroll said. "I have the utmost confidence in Mike — he's going to make a tremendous draft pick."

That seems to be the prevailing sentiment. ESPN's Mel Kiper rates Williams No. 1 overall in the draft.

Clarett ready for his time in pro football

By Joe Milicia
Associated Press

Maurice Clarett's long, strange trip to the NFL is nearing its end. Maybe.

It's been more than two years since Clarett scored the touchdown that gave Ohio State its first national title in 34 years.

Then came legal troubles, NCAA violations and a failed lawsuit against the NFL. A player once spoken of with the kind of awe reserved for a young talent like LeBron James had become synonymous with controversy and poor character.

Now, Clarett is saying and doing all the right things — enough, perhaps, for a team to select him in this weekend's NFL draft.

"He's definitely a second-day pick," said Gil Brandt, the NFL's draft consultant. "He's really tried to turn his life around."

Brandt knows Clarett hasn't dazzled anyone with his speed. After a disastrous showing at the NFL combine, Clarett improved last month at a private workout near his hometown of Warren, Ohio, running a 4.67-second 40-yard dash.

But Emmitt Smith and Jerome Bettis didn't run that fast either, Brandt said.

"He might be a player that just doesn't run fast, but somehow gets the job done," Brandt said.

Don't look for Clarett to get drafted any earlier than the fifth round, said Mike Mayock, a draft analyst for the NFL Network.

"This is pretty good running back class coming out this year. I'd much rather go with a proven track record of durability," Mayock said. "Is somebody going to say let's take a chance? Yes."

Brandt points to Clarett wrestling the ball away from Sean Taylor after an interception — one of the most memorable plays of Ohio State's 31-24 victory over top-ranked Miami in the 2003 Fiesta Bowl — for an example of why Clarett is worth drafting.

It was a play that took great football sense, something his representatives have been promoting in recent weeks.

"Maurice is one of these guys who you can do all the drills in the world, you put a football in his hand and he turns into a different kid," said his attorney, David Kenner. "That's Maurice. He's been doing it since he was 5 years old and I don't see any reason to believe it should change now."

Clarett rushed for 1,237 yards and 16 touchdowns as a freshman at Ohio State despite missing three games with injuries.

Then the trouble started.

Phil Masturzo/Akron Beacon Journal

Though Maurice Clarett's first collegiate game seemed like ages ago, he is finally ready to shoot into the NFL. After trying to enter the draft in his freshman year, Clarett has been waiting around for nearly two years.

Late-round steals dominate

Eric Athas

Stop talking about Alex Smith for a minute. I already know that Braylon Edwards is a prototypical receiver, and I don't need to hear about how many yards Ronnie Brown is going to rush for next season.

Year after year, as April rolls around, it seems as though the NFL nation is focused on the first round of the NFL Draft — and that's it. There are six other rounds that are certainly overlooked by fans and history proves that the later rounds can produce gems.

I will be the first to admit that I do not sit around and intensely gaze at the TV screen for all seven rounds, but that does not lower the significance of them. The most cliche example I can think of happens to be one of the most recent late-round steals, and that is the New England Patriots QB Tom Brady.

The three-time Super Bowl, two-time MVP, winner was selected in the sixth round (199th overall) of the 2000 draft as a "sub par" QB. The first signal-caller taken in that particular draft was Chad Pennington of the New York Jets — how many championships has he won?

For the most part, the players involved in the first round get more hype on draft day than they ever get the following season on the field. Out of the past four No. 1 overall picks — Philip Rivers (after a trade to the Giants), Carson Palmer, David Carr, Michael Vick — only one of them (Vick) managed to make it to the playoffs.

In last year's draft, the top 10 prospects did barely anything in comparison to No. 11 pick Rookie of the Year Ben Roethlisberger, who was the third overall QB taken.

While constructing first-round mock drafts can be entertaining, in retrospect, picking the sleepers in the draft can be a lot more perplexing. There are a few underrated prospects that do standout in this year's draft, however, and when they are taken following the first round, you can bet they will have a chip the size of Mel Kiper's hair-do on each of their shoulders.

Northern Colorado's Vincent Jackson is projected as a late second-round pick at wide receiver, and with this being the age of big receivers, Vincent could turn out to be a playmaker wherever he winds up. At 6-foot-6, 241 lbs., Jackson accumulated 1,582 yards and scored 11 touchdowns in 2004, while averaging a whopping 17.3 yards per catch.

He also is leaving the Bears a senior, something rare in an age that has become acquainted with drafting players straight out of the womb.

If you want to play the numbers game, just take a look at Kansas State's running back Darren Sproles. With 4,979 yards and 48 touchdowns amassed during his collegiate career, this guy can straight out play. There's just one problem — he's small. Not just small, but 5-foot-6, 181 lbs. small. While his size is a main reason that Sproles will not be taken early, there is no question in his ability, speed and strength. At the NFL Combine, Sproles bench pressed 225 lbs. 23 times.

For some perspective on how much strength Sproles has, Clifford Dukes, an outside linebacker out of Michigan State, recorded 22 reps in the 225-lb. bench press. Sproles may be a gamble, but he may also turn out to be a dangerous steal.

When the first round draftees shake commissioner Paul Tagliabue's hand on national television and hold that new shiny jersey in the air as they carefully attempt to put the team cap on without messing up their hair, they may turn out to be spectacular during the 2005 season.

But of course, don't overlook the ones that will be watching the draft from home on TV.

—Eric Athas is a Collegian Columnist

2005 NFL DRAFT

Picks 17-32

17. Cincinnati Bengals — Travis Johnson — Defensive Tackle — Florida St.
Bengels couldn't stop a running back last season if they were paid to. Wait...?

18. Minnesota Vikings — Marcus Spears — Defensive End — LSU
When you can't play defense, draft good defensive players. Good concept.

19. St. Louis Rams — Jammal Brown — Offensive Tackle — Oklahoma
When no one on the right side can block, draft someone who can block on the right side.

20. Dallas Cowboys — Dan Cody — Defensive End — Oklahoma
An Oklahoma Sooner who will play in Texas? This state rival will work out for Dallas.

21. Jacksonville Jaguars — Justin Miller — Cornerback — Clemson
A little soon to draft Miller, but he will fit in perfectly in Jaguars' scheme.

22. Baltimore Ravens — Roddy White — Wide Receiver — UAB
6-foot-1, 205 pounds, 4.42 second 40. Isn't this what Baltimore is looking for?

23. Seattle Seahawks — Fabian Washington — Cornerback — Nebraska
Does it even matter? Seahawks collapse after Thanksgiving anyway.

24. Green Bay Packers — Aaron Rodgers — Quarterback — California
Aaron Rodgers, meet Brett Favre. Good luck, kid.

25. Washington Redskins — Jason Campbell — Quarterback — Auburn
He's a better value at 25 than either Rodgers or Smith is in top-3.

26. Oakland Raiders — Heath Miller — Tight End — Virginia
Trying to get into Al Davis' head is impossible. Let's just go with Clarett.

27. Atlanta Falcons — Thomas Davis — Safety — Georgia
Great compliment to DeAngelo Hall in the Atlanta defensive backfield.

28. San Diego Chargers — Barrett Ruud — Linebacker — Nebraska
When scouts refer to you as a "tackling machine," things are going well for you.

29. Indianapolis Colts — DeMarcus Ware — DE/OLB — Troy
His speed will make him a phenomenal player on Indy's turf.

30. Pittsburgh Steelers — Matt Jones — QB/WR/TE — Arkansas
Kordell, Hines Ward, Antwaan Randle El, now Matt Jones.

31. Philadelphia Eagles — Reggie Brown — Wide Receiver — Georgia
Eagles need a receiver no matter what happens with T.O.

32. N.E. Patriots — Channing Crowder — Linebacker — Florida
Pats will take best player out of linebackers/cornerbacks available at 32.

'Showtime' ousted by Oakland

By Janie McCauley
Associated Press

ALAMEDA, Calif. — The man who calls himself "Showtime" is leaving the Oakland Raiders, and both sides appear happy to be parting ways.

The Raiders traded disgruntled cornerback Phillip Buchanon to the Houston Texans for two draft picks Tuesday, nearly four months after he publicly ridiculed the franchise with no warning leading into the final game.

Texans general manager Charley Casserly confirmed the deal Wednesday, but said it won't be official until Buchanon passes a physical and the NFL completes the required paperwork.

Oakland will receive a second-round and third-round pick in this weekend's NFL draft.

Texans coach Dom Capers praised Buchanon's speed and athletic ability.

"This gives us another young player at a position that is hard to come by," Capers said. "He has all of the things that you look for in that position. He has the natural skill to come in and play for us."

The Raiders had been trying to trade Buchanon in recent weeks. The team talked to the Washington Redskins about the self-assured Buchanon, who typically refers to himself in the third person and arrived at training camp in 2003 as a second-year pro in a limousine and wearing a fancy pajama suit.

Oakland traded its first-round draft selection, seventh overall, to Minnesota for Randy Moss and won't make its first pick until sixth in the second round, 38th overall. With the Buchanon trade, the Raiders will pick 47th overall. They already had the 69th pick in the third round and now also will receive one of Houston's two picks that round.

Buchanon, the Raiders' first-round pick in 2002 out of Miami, went off about the organization just four days before Oakland (5-11) ended another disappointing season with a home loss to Jacksonville.

"I mean there is a lot of stuff that goes on here and it ain't right," he said at the time. "I am not feeling too good here. I am not happy with the organization. Things ain't good right now. I know that."

Travis Ford looking to student body for basketball's revival former students who once populated this campus. UMass was their team. As the Maroon and White stormed up the national polls and into the Final Four, its following was as rabid as you'd find anywhere in the country.

After nearly a decade of mediocrity, however, it's difficult to find an undergraduate on this campus who can differentiate Maurice Maxwell from Cedric Maxwell.

For Ford, that is the foremost example of what needs to change in order to bring basketball fervor back to the Pioneer Valley: the students need to realize that they are arguably the biggest factor in bringing the type of basketball they want to see to the Mullins Center.

"We've got to get the student body to adopt this team again," Ford said. "We want the games to be an event, where the students dress up and get excited for them. We want them to own this basketball team and make up the loudest student section in America.

"But to accomplish this, we want any suggestions we can get from them to help figure out what we can do to make it appealing for them."

Ford knows his Minutemen will be fun to watch. He describes his style of play on both ends of the court simply as "aggressive" and preaches that his team will be outworked by no one. But without the aforementioned help from the student body, his efforts will go unnoticed and his pleas will fall on deaf ears.

The deed to the Massachusetts basketball program is there for the taking, and Travis Ford wants the students to buy it. All that's left is for those same students to show him how to sell it.

"Keep in mind I'm only 35 years old, and it wasn't too long ago that I was a student too," Ford said. "I want to get out to the places they go and get in touch with them on levels they understand and want to know me on.

"I want them to feel like I'm one of them, because that's what I want to be."

The Collegian wants you, the students, to help us give Travis Ford feedback on how he can best go about interacting with you and encouraging you to support UMass men's basketball. E-mail any suggestions you may have via to sports@dailycollegian.com.

Armstrong not fast in Georgia

By George Henry
Associated Press

MACON, Ga. — A day after announcing he will retire after the Tour de France, Lance Armstrong took it easy in the opening stage of a tuneup for cycling's most prestigious event.

Armstrong spent Tuesday in a pack with his teammates at the Tour de Georgia, avoiding risk of injury and finishing 15th in the race's first stage.

"We didn't go very fast," Armstrong said. "In fact, we went flat-out slow for most of the day. I was trying to stay out of trouble, and the guys did a good job staying out in front and keeping me out of the way."

In announcing his retirement plans Monday, Armstrong indicated the Georgia race could end his competitive career in North America, but he might consider another practice event in May to stay fresh for the Tour de France.

The 33-year-old Texan won the 648-mile Tour de Georgia last year, and went on to win the Tour de France for an unprecedented sixth straight time.

Robert Hunter, a South African racing for the Phonak Hearing Systems of Switzerland, won the 128.8-mile first leg in 5 hours, 47 minutes, 52 seconds. With fans lining the streets of downtown Macon, Hunter edged his front tire past Ben Brooks to earn the yellow jersey.

The Tour de Georgia continues Wednesday in Fayetteville and ends 122.7 miles later in the northwest town of Rome.

In Tuesday's racing, each of the top 56 finishers was credited with times of 5:47.52. Brooks, who races for the U.S. team Jelly Belly, and third-place finisher Michele Maccanti of Italy, also were credited with a time of 5:47.52.

"It wasn't a traditional kind of sprint," Brooks said of the finish. "The hill makes it kind of hard. You've got to have good position. I had a good shot, but Robbie's a world-class sprinter."

A special message for state employees
It's Your Health.
You Can't Afford To Limit Your Options.

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, you have until May 13 to select your health insurance plan for the coming year. This year, your menu of options includes three plans that use tiers to set copays at various hospitals. Because of the tiering criteria used by some of these plans, state workers who enroll in one of them may have to pay more to be treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital. There are some things we think you should know before you opt for one of these plans.

Of the three plans offering tiered networks:

- One ranked Cooley Dickinson as the best one based on quality and affordability.
- One ranked Cooley Dickinson Hospital in three different tiers based on three different measures of quality and affordability.
- One ranked Cooley Dickinson Hospital in the second tier, using minimal quality measures.

We believe that the quality of care provided and your relationship with your doctor and local hospital are what really matters. Under tiered plans, however, you could be financially penalized for choosing to seek treatment at the hospital nearest your home and your family, and the hospital at which your doctor has admitting privileges.

We encourage state workers to think long and hard before signing on to a plan that limits their healthcare options. We also encourage state workers to make an informed decision on this important matter. Talk to us or your health care provider before you choose a plan. Call (888) 554-4COH (4264).

UM ready for A-10s

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

This weekend in College Park, Md. should be an enjoyable one for the Massachusetts women's tennis team (15-6 4-0 Atlantic 10). On Friday the Minutewomen will play their first round match of the 2005 Atlantic 10 Tournament.

UMass is coming off their best regular season since they last won the A-10 Tournament in 2001. That was also the first they made an appearance in NCAA tournament in program history, where they fell to Arizona State in the Regionals.

Currently, UMass is on an eight-match winning streak and have won nine of their last 10 matches. Its success this season should pay off as the Minutewomen are projected to be seeded No. 1 and no lower than No. 2 according to the tentative coaches' polls.

If UMass is seeded No. 1, it will most likely play the winner of Duquesne (9-10 1-3 A-10) and St. Joseph (5-8 2-2 A-10), who will play Friday at 10 a.m.

The Minutewomen have only played Duquesne three times in their history. All three times the Maroon and White have come out on top. The two schools did not meet this year in the regular season; however, they squared off with the Dukes in last year's conference tournament, winning the quarterfinal match 4-0.

Senior captain Sasha Edelstein was able to pick up a singles victory against Duquesne in that match.

Saint Joseph's has only faced UMass twice and has lost both matches. The two haven't seen each other since 2002.

According to UMass coach Judy Dixon, should UMass advance past Duquesne or St. Joe's, they will most likely play rival Temple in the semifinals.

"UMass and Temple is always a grudge match," Dixon said. "They hate losing to us."

UMass does have a few concerns going into the weekend. One is the play and health of junior Dorothy Iwanowicz, who usually competes in the No. 4 slot for the Minutewomen. Iwanowicz sat out UMass' regular season finale against Holy Cross this past Monday.

Dixon stated that Iwanowicz was absent from the lineup on Monday mainly because she has the most "aches and pains" on the team, and she has struggled as of late. Dixon has also said in the past that Iwanowicz favors indoor play rather than outdoors, and the forecast for the weekend is playing right into her favor.

"This weekend is supposed to be cold and rainy, so Dorothy will be going into her match happy to be playing indoors," Dixon said.

"Dorothy loves indoor matches."

All year, Iwanowicz has been a stellar player for the Minutewomen. This season she went 14-4 in singles competition, mainly from the No. 3 and No. 4 positions. Lately she has been teamed with junior Susan Johnson in the No. 1 doubles competition. In that slot, the duo is 4-3.

Another concern for Dixon's squad is the inexperience of some of the key members of the team. This will be the first conference tournament for sophomore Michele Spiess and freshman Masha Pozar.

"They're nervous because they know the opportunity to play in the NCAAs is at stake," Dixon said.

Spiess has been the standout on this very talented UMass squad. This season she has posted the best record on the team at 17-3 and has been looked to numerous times to come up with a big win when the team needed it. Spiess has also teamed with Pozar to compete in doubles competition, going 12-8 from the No. 1 and 2 slots.

Pozar has made strong case to win the 2005 Rookie of the Year award in the A-10. She has already won Rookie of the Week honors twice this season, once on Sept. 21 and again on March 28. She has gone 13-8 this season, mainly from the No. 2 singles slot.

Pats have different draft views

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO — The New England Patriots go into the draft with a team that already looks different than last season's champions.

Ty Law and Troy Brown were released and Tedy Bruschi had a mild stroke that could sideline him at least for this season. Still, coach Bill Belichick isn't counting on immediate contributions from the players he picks this weekend.

"It is not always what a guy can do on the first opening day of his rookie year," he said. "We have seen a lot of players that have changed their value to the team as they have improved, whether it be after the first year or after the second year."

That growth process worked so well that the Patriots won three of the last four Super Bowls, an amazing accomplishment but one that extends their season and cuts into their time to plan for the draft.

"I'm glad that that was the situation," Belichick said. "But, it is still putting three months worth of work into two or two and a half," he said. "There is nothing we can do about it."

He and his staff haven't had to spend much time studying the top 10 to 15 players available since the Patriots have the last picks of the first and second rounds. That gives them fewer options to trade for a better pick than they had last year, when they had the 21st and 32nd picks but kept both.

Their third pick is the 100th overall, a compensatory choice for losing free agents. Their own third-round choice was traded to Arizona for cornerback Duane Starks. They're not allowed to trade the compensatory pick.

"That really limits what you can do in the first two rounds," Belichick said.

The key for Belichick is how a drafted player performs within the Patriots' system once he becomes familiar with it. And that player could be chosen in a late round rather than on Saturday's first day of the draft, when the first three rounds will take place.

The Patriots took quarterback Tom Brady in the sixth round in 2000, a choice Belichick called the best of his career.

But he also took wide receiver David Givens in the seventh round in 2002 and center Dan Koppen in the fifth round in 2003. Then there's Brown, an eighth-round pick in 1993 who turned into an outstanding wide receiver and even saw considerable action at defensive back last season.

With an eye toward controlling their salary cap, the Patriots released Brown and should be set at wide receiver after signing veterans David Terrell and Tim Dwight. Belichick said Brown could be re-signed.

"I don't want to comment on any of those personal conversations," he may have had concerning that possibility, he said.

The Patriots could use help in the draft at defensive back after releasing Law following 10 years with the team. And Bruschi's condition — along with the release of linebacker Roman Phifer — creates a need at that position.

Belichick shed no light on the likelihood of Bruschi playing this year.

"I think that Tedy has made a number of comments about his situation, and I would just defer to him on any of those. I don't have anything to add," he said.

Even if Belichick isn't counting on Bruschi for the coming season, that may not influence him to draft a linebacker.

"If you are looking for a certain type of player, there is going to be a group that really appeals to you," he said, "and there is going to be another group that you just really don't have much use for but are going to be drafted because other teams will be looking for those types of players."

Since the Super Bowl, the team has added linebackers Monty Beisel from Kansas City and Wesly Mallard from the New York Giants.

But Belichick said his current roster doesn't have much of an impact on his draft plans.

"I don't think if you start drafting by need or try to come out of the draft and say, 'Well, we needed and guard and we got a guard. We needed a receiver and we got a receiver,' " he said. "But, if they can't perform and fill that role for you competitively on the field, then you really haven't done anything."

Even if he doesn't pick a linebacker or defensive back, he can still add productive young players. Before last season the Patriots signed free agent rookie Randall Gay and he ended up starting most of the games at cornerback.

Ford wants students' help

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Travis Ford wants to make something abundantly clear: He didn't come to Amherst just to coach basketball. He came here to make UMass basketball fun again for the students of this campus.

The new Massachusetts men's basketball coach also wants to remind those same students, who can likely compile a list of more than a thousand various things they did other than attend Minuteman games over the past few seasons, that he needs their help more than anything as he tries to breathe life back into a struggling program.

With that in mind, Ford is prepared to wage an all-out siege on dorms, dining commons and any other places the off-absent UMass student body may be hiding to prove what a hot ticket his Minutemen will be, and why those same students should want to come and watch them when they take to the Mullins Center hardwood next winter.

"I want the students to get to know me and my staff personally, and not just as the basketball coaches," Ford said. "The biggest thing is just getting out there and getting connected with the students; telling them about their team, what style of basketball we're going to play, what our schedule is going to be like and what we're going to do to make the games exciting again."

Arriving on the heels of the unsuccessful four-year regime of former coach Steve Lappas, Ford has not been provided with a model as to how he should go about producing excitement around his team on campus.

One of the major criticisms of Lappas was his inability to connect with the program's dormant fan base, and similar shortcomings in drawing more than a smattering of those fans to the 9,493-seat Mullins Center.

Ford plans to change that, and fast. Yet, without the help of the students themselves, he will be left to stab in the dark at what will really work in bringing a little bit of 1996 into 2005.

"I'm going to make myself accessible, but I want to know: what can I do to get you [the student] involved?" Ford asks. "I want the games to be something they look back on in 10 or 15 years and remember that they were there and all the fun they had, and say 'Hey, UMass is my team.'"

There is no question that for many

ECAC will finish with a dog fight

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

With the final few weeks of the lacrosse season on the horizon, the ECAC is once again going to be a fight to the finish. Although the Georgetown Hoyas are leading the conference, the UMass Minutemen and Penn State are both 3-1 and a game behind. If it were to come down to the Nittany Lions and the Minutemen at season's end, UMass has the tiebreaker, stemming from its 18-8 victory over Penn State on April 2.

Big Dogs on Campus

The Georgetown Hoyas have been one of the hottest teams in the ECAC this season and have continued their dominance over the past week, downing conference foe Loyola 14-10 on Saturday and out-of-conference opponent Mt. St. Mary's on April 13, 14-10. Both games were on the road.

Georgetown is currently in first place in the ECAC, going 3-0 in conference, and is also ranked No. 3 in the nation. The Hoyas continue their road-trip this Saturday when they face the UMass Minutemen in Amherst.

The Hoyas had a couple of players earn ECAC honors this week, with Brodie Merrill winning the Defensive Player of the Week award and Brendan Cannon taking the Rookie of the Week honor. Merrill is also a Tewaaraton Trophy candidate and leads the Hoyas with 69 ground balls.

A Change of Fate

The Loyola Greyhounds have been on a bit of a skid recently, dropping their last three games to Syracuse (April 9), Georgetown on Saturday, and UMBC on Tuesday. Previous to its loss to Syracuse, Loyola had won four games in a row, including three at home, defeating Wagner (13-7 on March 15) and ECAC foes St. John's (6-3 on March 19) and UMass (6-5 on March 26). Loyola won its fourth game against ECAC opponent Rutgers on the road.

The Greyhounds have one more conference game left in the season when they face off against Hobart College on April 30. The game will be their last home contest of the season before they head to Baltimore to take on John's Hopkins, who is currently the top-ranked team in the nation.

Going Streaking

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has been one of the best teams in the country over the past two weeks, defeating three straight ECAC rivals. The Minutemen defeated Penn State (18-8 on April 2), St. John's (14-6 on April 9), and Hobart (14-12 on Saturday).

UMass loses in Beanpot

LOWELL — In the opening round of the Beanpot Classic, the Massachusetts baseball team pulled within one run of Harvard, but could not stop the Crimson from pulling away for an 11-5 victory at LeLaucher Park.

Down by two runs in the top of the seventh, the Maroon and White had two runners on first and second with two outs. Senior right fielder Curt Szado took advantage of the RBI opportunity and singled through the left side to score sophomore first baseman Bill Rankin, who had walked two batters earlier.

Harvard	11

With senior left fielder Jason Twomley on second and Szado at first, sophomore third baseman Bryan Adamski was hit by a pitch and loaded the bases for freshman catcher Bryan Garrity. On a full count, Garrity ripped a solid shot to right side that hit off the back foot of Adamski for the final out of the inning, as a base runner cannot come in contact with a live ball. Though ruling had Adamski called out on unassisted by the second baseman, Garrity was awarded a hit.

"I was shocked, because the runner was suppose to be in motion, and we got a hard hit ball," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I'm thinking 'we're going ahead right here.' So, I was taken by surprise."

Harvard capitalized by going on a five-run rally in the bottom of the seventh to push the lead to six and nail home the victory.

Harvard third baseman Steffan Wilson, who eventually closed out the game on the mound for Crimson, hit a leadoff single to start the rally. After Wilson was moved to third on a sacrifice bunt with another runner on first, shortstop Morgan Brown hit an RBI single to score Wilson.

In the next at-bat, second baseman Brendan Byrne hit a chopper that looked like a sure assist for freshman shortstop Zach Thomas, but the ball took a high, bad bounce over his head for a hit and an RBI.

With two in scoring position, center field/third baseman Chris Vance hit a deep triple to right-center to score two more and push the score to 10-5. Left fielder Ian Wallace added the final run of with a bloop single to shallow center to score Vance.

"We didn't play well enough to win," Stone said. "We just beat ourselves. Once again, we found ways to beat ourselves. I can't say much about [Harvard]. They just play better."

Wilson put on an impressive performance with the bat and on the mound. The Harvard freshman sensation went 2-for-4 with two runs, a walk and an RBI. After starting the game at third, Wilson pitched 2.1 scoreless innings and gave up one hit to earn the save. Wilson leads the team in batting average, hitting .356, and also has four saves on the year. There was a milestone achieved by Harvard senior catcher Schuyler Mann, who hit his 23rd career home run in the fifth inning to tie Harvard's career home run record.

The Minutemen will play at Yawkey Way in historic Fenway Park today when they take on the loser of the game between Northeastern and Boston College at 2 p.m. in the Beanpot consolation game.

It's time to go NFL drafting

Jeff Howe

Maurice Clarett, welcome to the National Football League. Just don't take anyone to court this year, and you might be alright.

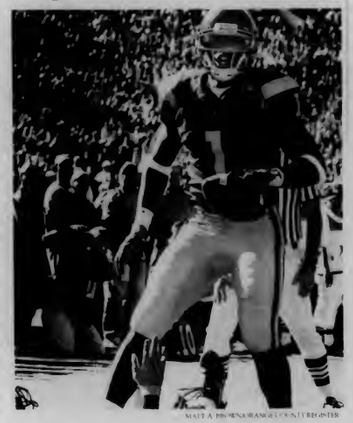
Mike Williams, kudos to you, too. It's time to prove to Paul Tagliabue that you really are ready for the big show, even though you already were at this time last year.

It's draft time, baby, and the San Francisco 49ers are on the clock.

Yes, the NFL Draft. It's time for Mike Tice to show up late — which he can do twice in the first 18 picks this year — it's time for stocks to rise, dreams to shatter and the San Diego Chargers to waste another pick.

Sorry, the Chargers did a pretty decent job last year, but even George W. Bush can walk without falling once in awhile.

Just in case Californians are worried about their local teams having a successful draft, though, it's now San Francisco's turn to mess everything up.



If the 49ers select one of the two "top" quarterbacks in Aaron Rodgers or Alex Smith, they will have done their organization and fans a huge injustice.

Neither signal caller has the ability to take over a franchise, let alone one that is in such shambles as San Fran's.

And both of them would be lucky to grace the top-20 of any draft board in just about any other year. As it is, one of them could fall as low as No. 24 to the Packers this year.

What the 49ers should do doesn't seem to be too much like rocket science, either. Trade the pick, move down to somewhere between No. 5 and No. 8, select USC wideout Mike Williams, and go home happy.

Besides, the second tier of quarterbacks — Jason Campbell, Charlie Frye, Jason White, David Greene — could all stabilize an offense to a similar degree as Smith or Rodgers, and a few of them will still be around by the time San Fran picks again at No. 33.

MATT A. BROWNA/ORANGE COUNTY REGISTER

If the 49ers were smart, they would draft USC wide receiver Mike Williams, but time will only tell.

No matter who the 49ers pick, they still aren't much more than a five-win team next year, which should all but guarantee them a top-3 selection in the 2006 draft.

That means they would be in prime position to select golden boy and California hero Matt Leinart, who could spend the rest of his career hooking up with former teammate Williams a la Joe Montana to Jerry Rice.

Sounds easy, doesn't it?

What isn't easy, however, is what the Auburn program is about to do.

Running backs Ronnie Brown and Carnell Williams are about to be the first halfback tandem from the same school to be selected in the top-20 of the draft.

Ever.

Even more astounding is the fact that they could both be drafted in the first five picks.

Maybe the most interesting selection in Saturday's first four rounds is Cleveland's No. 3 pick, which will be up to Bill Belichick's protégé Romeo Crennel. The Patriots' former defensive coordinator could scoop up one of the two quarterbacks, any of the top-three running backs or a game-breaking wide receiver in Braylon Edwards or Williams.

Watch out for a pick that could be as wobbly as a Trent Dilfer lame duck deep ball, though. Crennel could drop a jaw or two by locking up Texas linebacker Derrick Johnson, who could be the most talented player in the Class of 2005.

Anyone who watched the Pats steamroll through the NFL over the past few years would know exactly how important the linebacking corps was to their defense. Hey, it's just a suggestion.

Happy drafting, everyone.

Collegian 2005 Mock NFL Draft

There are a lot of questions in this draft, and they begin at the very beginning with the San Francisco 49ers.

Who will they pick? Rodgers, Smith, Edwards, Williams, Brown?

We didn't make these predictions based on trades, though we can admit there should be a ton of movement during the first two hours of the draft on Saturday.

You may notice a few alarming things about our picks. Maybe the most confusing is the absence of California quarterback Aaron Rodgers from the first half of the list. The fact is, if Rodgers or Smith slips past Tampa Bay and Arizona, neither one will be picked until Green Bay gets its turn at No. 24.

So without further ado, the San Francisco 49ers are on the clock with the first pick of the 2005 NFL Draft.

— Jeff Howe, Eric Athas, Dan Duggan, Ian Kilpatrick and Jon Pelland

NOTE: Picks 17-32 are on page 11.

2005 NFL DRAFT

Team	Player	Position	School
1. San Francisco 49ers	Alex Smith	Quarterback	Utah
Smith is by no means a franchise quarterback, but the 49ers seem happy regardless.
2. Miami Dolphins	Ronnie Brown	Running Back	Auburn
The Dolphins need to rid their fans of all things named Ricky Williams.
3. Cleveland Browns	Braylon Edwards	Wide Receiver	Michigan
The Browns could go in other directions, but Edwards' talent can't be passed up.
4. Chicago Bears	Mike Williams	Wide Receiver	USC
Rex Grossman needs someone to throw to. Mike Williams will make him better.
5. Tampa Bay Buccaneers	Carnell Williams	Running Back	Auburn
The Bucs will ride their Cadillac in style all the way to third in the division.
6. Tennessee Titans	Antrel Rolle	Defensive Back	Miami
Lose Samari, gain Antrel. The Titans just keep on Rolle-ing.
7. Minnesota Vikings	Derrick Johnson	Linebacker	Texas
Johnson forced more fumbles than anyone in NCAA history. Not bad at 7.
8. Arizona Cardinals	Cedric Benson	Running Back	Texas
One thing the Cards need to do is find a replacement for Emmitt Smith.
9. Washington Redskins	Adam Jones	Cornerback	West Virginia
"Pac-Man" and Sean Taylor will anchor this defense for a long, long time.
10. Detroit Lions	David Pollack	Defensive End	Georgia
Dream scenario for the Lions at No. 10, as they badly need a defensive end.
11. Dallas Cowboys	Shawn Merriman	OLB/DE	Maryland
The 'Boys need a D-end and outside linebacker. Merriman gives them both.
12. San Diego Chargers	Troy Williamson	Wide Receiver	South Carolina
Fastest wide receiver in the draft is a good fit for a team without many holes.
13. Houston Texans	Alex Barron	Offensive Tackle	Florida State
Can someone block for David Carr? Anyone? Please?
14. Carolina Panthers	Mark Clayton	Wide Receiver	Oklahoma
A little early to call on Clayton, but he'll fit nicely for Delhomme's air attack.
15. Kansas City Chiefs	Carlos Rodgers	Cornerback	Auburn
Chiefs need the best defensive player available. Rodgers isn't bad at No. 15.
16. New Orleans Saints	Marlin Jackson	Cornerback	Michigan
Jackson needs a little grooming, but the potential is certainly there.

GEO class boycott attracts hundreds

By Mike Sances
Collegian Correspondent

Hundreds of people converged on the lawn of the Student Union at the University of Massachusetts Thursday as part of a class boycott staged by undergraduate and graduate student groups.

Meanwhile, Gov. Mitt Romney made an unannounced visit to the campus in the midst of a three-hour, campus-wide picket by members of the university's graduate student union.

The boycott had been in the works since last month and had been promoted extensively around campus while being organized by the Graduate Employee Organization. GEO claims it was held in response to a year of deadlocked negotiations between the union and university administrators, who the union says won't back down from their proposal of cuts in real wages, health and child care benefits.

Beginning at 9:00 a.m., GEO members picketed all major classroom buildings on campus, holding blue signs, walking in circles, singing chants and generally making as much noise as possible with the help of makeshift drums.

"I think it's ridiculous that they're trying to basically take money out of our pockets," said Noah Enelow, a graduate student in the economics department who picketed between Goodell and Thompson halls. "We are the people that make this university run."

Jesse Barba of the sociology department rejected claims that alternative means hadn't yet been exhausted. "We've tried that before," he said, referring to the idea of a sit down session with Chancellor John Lombardi. Barba stressed that he would have preferred the situation hadn't lead to a boycott, but that his group's position was "not even that extreme.

"You owe people a decent compensation for what they do," he said.

The Massachusetts Society of Professors, headed by UMass sociology professor Dan Clawson, the resident assistants union, and members of the undergraduate group Take Back UMass also participated in the picketing.

The sunny weather attracted large groups of visitors to campus yesterday, bringing with it tour guides leading bemused groups of prospective students and their parents through numerous picketing sites and subsequent festivities on the Student Union lawn.

Bicyclists also enjoyed the sun yesterday, as scores of protesters rode up and down North Pleasant Street and all around campus in support of the day's events in an action known as "Critical UMass."

At noon, picketers traveled to the lawn from their respective picketing sites, merging with the several hundred spectators already participating in the ongoing teach-ins, who cheered their arrival. Ware River Club provided live music, while a long line quickly formed for hamburgers and hot dogs. Within an hour, the rally had reached a peak of nearly 1,000 people.

Deerfield murder has locals baffled

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

DEERFIELD — It was late last summer when Bryan Hall won $136 from a slot machine, walked into the first jewelry store he saw and bought Brandy Waryasz an engagement ring.

Dropping to a knee on Atlantic City's boardwalk, he proposed to the girl he met in grade school. She accepted, and soon had a surprise for him: she was pregnant.

It was supposed to be a new start for 21-year-old Brandy, who had separated from her first husband and was saving up from her job at a Deerfield gas station to pay for a divorce lawyer.

Those plans shattered last Saturday when someone strangled her and left the body on the gas station floor before taking off with the cash register. Brandy was seven months pregnant.

As police tried to solve this quiet town's first murder in 26 years, Hall and Waryasz's family were preparing to cremate his fiancee and the unborn son they were going to name Dane.

"She's the only girl I ever met in my entire life who cared about me," said Hall, 21, who recently learned he had qualified for a loan to buy a house in Turners Falls, where the couple wanted to raise their baby close to Brandy's family.

"She wanted to create a life for us," he said. "Everything we did, we did together."

They met about 11 years ago in grammar school. Brandy dropped out of high school after marrying a man from New Hampshire, but that relationship soured and she came back to Massachusetts.

"He's been out of her life for quite awhile," Brandy's mother, Ruth Cousineau, said of her estranged husband.

Brandy reconnected with Hall and studied for her GED. She moved into an apartment in Turners Falls with her mother, sister and uncle, who got her the part-time job at the gas station on a flat, well-traveled stretch of Routes 5 and 10.

"I feel so guilty because I got her the job," said Jerry Cousineau, 37. "But I would never imagine something like this would happened in Deerfield."

A quaint rural community about 35 miles north of Springfield, Deerfield is home to one of New England's best preserved Colonial villages and the prestigious Deerfield Academy prep school. Three-hundred years ago, it was the site of the bloodiest Indian attack of early American history, but today the town is better known for attracting tourists to Yankee Candle's flagship store.

Brandy spent Fridays and Saturdays at work reading Harry Potter books and chatting with customers. She was the attendant who always smiled when washing down a windshield and never got annoyed when drivers stopped to ask for directions, said her boss, Barbara Rhinehardt.

It seemed that nothing — whether it was her nagging migraines or personal troubles — could wipe a smile from her face.

"She's always showed up at work singing," Rhinehardt said.

Last Saturday, a customer told Rhinehardt he was going to become a regular because Brandy was so pleasant.

"Later that day, she was dead," Rhinehardt said. "I can't believe anyone would do that to someone so nice."

Police say they are following several leads, but would not elaborate. No suspects were publicly identified by Thursday. The gas station, owned by A.R. Sandri Inc. of Greenfield, wasn't outfitted with security cameras.

Conn. Gov. signs gay civil unions into law

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Connecticut on Wednesday became the second state to offer civil unions to gay couples — and the first to do so without being forced by the courts.

About an hour after the state Senate sent her the legislation, Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell signed into law a bill that will afford same-sex couples in Connecticut many of the rights and privileges of married couples.

"The vote we cast today will reverberate around the country and it will send a wave of hope to many people, to thousands of people across the country," said Sen. Andrew McDonald, who is gay.

The state House passed the measure last week but amended it to define marriage under Connecticut law as between one man and one woman. The Senate approved the amended bill Wednesday 26-8. The law takes effect Oct. 1.

"I have said all along that I believe in no discrimination of any kind and I think that this bill accomplishes that, while at the same time preserving the traditional language that a marriage is between a man and a woman," Rell said.

Vermont is the only other state to allow civil unions. Massachusetts allows gay couples to marry. But those changes came about after same-sex couples won court battles.

Last summer, seven same-sex couples sued in Connecticut after being denied marriage licenses; the case has not been resolved.

Roman Catholics and pro-marriage activists plan a big rally Sunday in opposition to the bill.

Marie Hilliard, executive director of the Connecticut Catholic Conference, said the civil union proposal "got more legs than we ever hoped it would get." About 44 percent of the state's 3 million residents are Roman Catholic.

Brian Brown, head of the Family Institute of Connecticut, said his group intends to keep the issue squarely before the public.

"Our mission will be to let every person know in the state of Connecticut which lawmakers voted to redefine marriage, and which lawmakers voted to protect marriage," he said.

Anne Stanback, executive director of Loves Makes a Family, said her group would probably begin talking to lawmakers about gay marriage— though she acknowledged it's not likely the issue will be taken up next session.

Guilty verdicts in Harvard Sq. gang murder

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — Three gang members and a heroin addict were convicted of murder Thursday for stabbing and beating a 21-year-old drifter to death and dumping her body into the Charles River.

Despite more than six weeks of sometimes conflicting testimony, the jury in Suffolk Superior Court deliberated for less than a day before finding Ismael Vasquez, 27, his 23-year-old brother Luis, Harold Parker, 31, and Scott Davenport, 31, guilty of first-degree murder.

Parker and the Vasquez brothers were also convicted of kidnapping Jo Nachtwey, a recent arrival from Hawaii who hung around Harvard Square with other young homeless people. The kidnapping charge against Davenport was dropped earlier Thursday.

Luis Vasquez was also convicted of rape. All four face mandatory life term at their sentencing, scheduled for Friday morning.

A woman was escorted out of court after she began screaming and crying as the verdicts were read.

"Jo Nachtwey was the ultimate innocent victim," prosecutor Patrick Haggan said. "She was known on the streets of Harvard Square as someone who didn't belong. She was described as an angel, like a child. She was brutally murdered."

Defense attorneys said they would appeal and criticized the jury for deliberating for just five hours after weeks of testimony.

The Vasquez brothers and Parker were the leaders of a fledging gang that Nachtwey and her friends had been recruited to join. Davenport was a heroin addict who was along for the ride because the other three defendants could get him drugs, his attorney said.

In closing arguments, Assistant District Attorney Patrick Haggan said Nachtwey was terrified as they drove to a railroad bridge spanning the river between Cambridge and Boston because she knew the men planned to kill her to send a message to a rebellious faction within the gang.

She first tried to jump from the moving car and then agreed to have sex with Luis Vasquez, the gang leader, in the desperate hope that he'd protect her, he said.

But the men had already decided to kill her, Haggan said.

"This was a cowardly, vicious and senseless murder and each and every one of the defendants wanted it to happen or chose to allow it to happen," Haggan said.

Key witnesses for the prosecution included two 21-year-old women, Ana White and Lauren Alleyne, who avoided life in prison by pleading guilty to manslaughter and agreeing to testify against the four others.

They were sentenced to 12 years in prison, and with time served are due to get out around 2010.

GEO rally overshadows Gov. Romney's visit ing "BOYCOTT" in across the windows of the SGA office, students and professors spoke on topics ranging from same-sex benefits, child care, wage cuts, Chancellor Lombardi's Draft Action Plan, globalization and the Iraq war.

Benefits for same-sex partners is one of GEO's major sticking points with the university. Vanessa Adel, a graduate student and teacher, accused Romney of eliminating same-sex benefits to improve his chances for a potential run for the presidency in 2008.

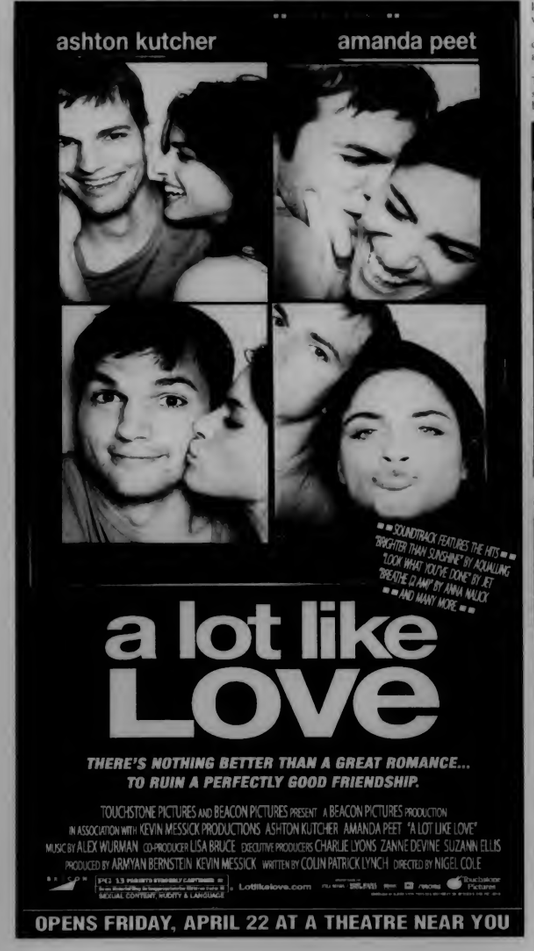
"This is not a financial issue. This is a callous political ploy," she said.

Barbara Ehrenreich, author of the book "Nickel and Dimed," which chronicles her time spent living undercover among the American working poor, spoke of the events at UMass in a national context. "We need to wake up and realize that there is a war going on here," she said. "There is a larger nationwide context here." Ehrenreich said that while she could barely survive on seven dollars an hour during her jobs for "Nickel and Dimed," graduate students at UMass make even less, at about $12,000 a year—well below the poverty line.

By early afternoon, organizers were declaring the walkout a success.

Bartlett, Machmer, and Thompson had only one or two students all day, said GEO member Mark Nelson, claiming "tremendous support from the 22,000 undergrads on campus, because they know we're right."

But while the event had been billed as centered around undergraduate issues as much as it was around the graduate union's contract negotiations, much less was said regarding the Chancellor's Draft Action Plan, which the undergraduate group Take Back UMass has denounced as a "power grab" of control from student groups.



Early in the day, it was learned that the campus would be receiving a visit from Romney, who was scheduled to attend a meeting of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education at 10:15 a.m. in Goodell Hall. Protesters decided to give the governor a special welcome, taking advantage of the public meeting by filling up the rear of the room with around thirty silent demonstrators. As wooden stakes are not allowed indoors due to the picketing code, the demonstrators held the signs with their hands.

Outside, the sounds of picketers chanting, "No contract, no peace," along with cheering, clapping, and the banging of plastic bottles and drums, were clearly audible during the governor's talk. Romney allowed for two questions, both from non-student members of the Board of Higher Education, before abruptly moving on to another engagement at the Mullins Center.

Romney spoke briefly to the Board on issues ranging from the state budget to the recent effort to create a public law school in Massachusetts as part of the UMass system.

But most of the governor's remarks concerned compensation for the state's public university presidents. The governor stressed that such compensation should not be increased by over two percent annually.

"State employment doesn't pay as well as private sector employment," Romney said.

Walkout proved educational

Lisa McLaughlin

Like several other people on this campus, I've gotten the impression that GEO is one of those groups who protest everything for the sake of protesting. Why? Apparently to ease their insufferable boredom with life. So when I first heard about yesterday's class boycott, I rolled my eyes thinking, "GEO is at it again."

Over the past two weeks, I continued to hear about it. I was handed fliers and perpetually screamed at by neon posters saying, "A21: No Business As Usual!" I heard stories from other students that GEO members were storming classrooms shouting and banging drums— sometimes disrupting exams. I thought that if I was handed one more of those annoying little fliers, I was going to lose it.

Then I tried to be rational. I kicked into devil's advocate mode. I realized that these people are clearly very angry about something, and that they desperately want to be heard. "Why?" I asked myself. "What is the big deal here?" I needed to hear their side of the story. If I were in their shoes, would I do the same thing?

So as most of my peers used the boycott as an excuse to sleep in, I got my butt out of bed to get to campus by 9 a.m. for a different kind of education. I thought that I'd be damned if I didn't at least learn something when classes were cancelled, especially since my family and I are paying so much for me to come here and learn.

I thought that I'd be damned if I didn't at least learn something when classes were cancelled, especially since my family and I are paying so much for me to come here and learn. I can honestly say that I learned a lot yesterday.

I can honestly say that I learned a lot yesterday.

I learned that graduate teaching assistants are paid only $12,000 a year for the work they do. That's less than $7 an hour in a 35-hour workweek. I could make more than that working at Blockbuster or the local movie theater. If I was only making that much, I might as well resolve to do jobs any 15-year-old could do for the rest of my life if I want to be able to pay rent, buy groceries and support my family.

I was told by Jed Murr, the Vice President of GEO, that the typical work week for graduate student employees is somewhere between 40 and 60 hours. This includes teaching, studying, doing research and taking care of children, where applicable. There is hardly any time to hold a part-time job, unless you think that failing academically and becoming an insomniac is a good idea.

Wages this low for our skilled graduate student instructors is wrong.

The administration has forced people to live in poverty and face the heartbreaking decision of dropping out of school because they simply cannot afford it. Everybody deserves a chance to make a better life for themselves and their loved ones, no matter what their economic standing is. Denying people this right is denying them the fundamental rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness that was preached by the founders of this nation.

I also learned that the university is cutting healthcare to domestic partnerships. Yes, same-sex couples can get married in Massachusetts, but this puts them more at risk for discrimination. Many of the rights they obtained in Massachusetts do not apply in the rest of the United States. They cannot adopt children in 43 states: they cannot get a divorce unless it is in this state. A same-sex spouse, if not yet a U.S citizen, can be refused visas, or even deported.

I listened as slam poetry artist "Soulfighter" shook the ground with his loud, resonating voice. I was especially chilled when he said, "For every lost child in poverty, we'll find a receipt ... if this is a dream, I ain't buying it."

Many believe that this boycott didn't accomplish anything, but I believe it did. I received a real-life, in-your-face education yesterday, and I hope that others were similarly affected. You don't have to agree with GEO or the way they conduct things, but have an open mind and seek understanding before you criticize their efforts. There's a reason why they're frustrated and upset. You would be too. Yes, they can be annoying, but nonetheless, they're trying to get a message across. Listen, learn and decide for yourself whether or not it's the right message for UMass.

Is it really breaking news?

Erin McNamee

I'm through with you, CNN. You're dead to me, Headline News. And don't even look at me, FOX News.

As you can see, 24-hour news channels and I are in a fight. We're not even on silent-nodding terms. We're done. Finished. Kaput.

My hatred of 24-hour news networks officially solidified two weeks ago when a friend told me about CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer's various transgressions. Most notably, on April 8 Wolf Blitzer and Judy Woodruff hosted a special edition of "Inside Politics" with "Crossfire" co-hosts Paul Begala and Robert Novak to discuss Pope John Paul II's funeral. Begala and Novak are Catholics, a fact Blitzer didn't let them forget.

Blitzer basically accused Begala, on live television, of not being a good Catholic simply because he's a liberal. Begala was obviously taken aback and attempted to defend himself, but instead of apologizing or moving on, Blitzer admonished him with this patronizing remark: "Don't be so sensitive."

Is this what constitutes "news" in our country these days? Instead of getting facts and intelligent analytical commentary, we are forced to watch two grown men bicker over personal issues. I believe that in this instance, Begala was entitled to defend himself, but Blitzer was totally out of line. As a result of Blitzer's comments, what was intended to be a show discussing the Pope's funeral for God's sake (pun intended) quickly spiraled into an airing of dirty laundry and personal vendettas.

What's worse is that many people seem to have become addicted to the constant availability of "news" these channels provide, so much so that they have come to expect it from every other channel on television. For instance, I tape a certain daytime television show that I won't name here for fear of public ridicule, and at least once a week it's interrupted for so-called "breaking news" updates.

First of all, these "breaking news" reports often contain five minutes at the beginning and end of the report containing nothing but ludicrous dramatic music and graphics. The urgency of the pounding drums and the solemnity of the blaring trumpets are obviously intended to stop you in your tracks, because who knows, maybe there's been another terrorist attack or perhaps a serial killer has been apprehended. You know, "real" news of the life-changing variety.

But there's rarely anything "breaking" about these reports at all. For instance, my show was interrupted for over 20 minutes the other day while video feed showed black smoke pouring out of a chimney. Now, I know this signaled the first official, yet unsuccessful, vote on the new pope, but come on. You interrupted my program for 20 minutes to show black smoke coming out of a chimney? If I really wanted to know what color smoke was pouring out of a chimney in Rome, I wouldn't have been watching so-and-so's mother's cousin's half-brother try to marry his ex-wife's sister.

As a result of Blitzer's comments, what was intended to be a show of discussing the pope's funeral for God's sake (no pun intended) quickly spiraled into an airing of dirty laundry and personal vendettas.

No. Instead I would have been glued to some 24-hour news network watching an overweight, balding, excessively perspiring man scream at people just because they don't happen to share his same exact views on underwater basket weaving.

Is it any wonder that younger generations of Americans are apathetic about politics and foreign affairs? With all these bozos screaming at and insulting supposed "guests" on their television programs, it's hard to distinguish what's actually important from what's simply ratings fodder.

Suppose I see that Bill O'Reilly is going to have guests on his program to discuss the morality of stem cell research and I tune in because I'm interested. Most likely what's initially a calm, fact-based conversation will quickly devolve into a pissing contest proliferated by an overabundance of testosterone and not enough brains.

I'm not saying that regular network news channels are perfect, but 24-hour news channels are just getting ridiculous. Rather than try to educate you on what's happening around the world, these networks, for the most part, have taken to trying to entertain you for 24-hours straight.

Lately it seems every time I turn on CNN it has some insipid Barbie Doll-like host with an ingratiating southern accent trying to empathize with the parents of a kidnapping victim. Or worse, Larry King bullying his guests into submission with his God-awful suspenders and complete absence of a brain.

This lack of competency on 24-hour news networks has me convinced that I get a better grasp of what's going on in the world just from watching VH1's "Best Week Ever." At least that show doesn't put all those comedians in one room and let them yell at each other. And even if they did, I'm sure those guys would have more intelligent, coherent ideas to put forth. Best of all, we'd only have to deal with them once a week for a half-hour at a time. Sounds like paradise to me.

Life as a penguin, post-UMass

Michael Anmuth

As I near the end of my junior year of college, I think back to when I was considerably younger and answering the question of, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" While I have changed the answer over the years many, many times, I can't help but think that one thing has remained constant; I couldn't make up my mind then and I cannot make up my mind now.

From wanting to be a dog groomer to a writer to a computer analyst to all sorts of things, when I got to college and went through 12 different majors, there has been a constant ambiguity in the vision in my mind of being in the working world. Somewhere between switching from a Public Relations major to an English major, or maybe it was between English and Philosophy (they all tend to blend after a while), something became perfectly clear to me, I have no idea what I want to be when I grow up.

I decided simply and sophisticatedly that as long as I could be whatever I wanted to be, like my mom told me when I was little, that I'm going to be a penguin. That's right, a penguin.

Today while contemplating this question again, I decided simply and sophisticatedly that as long as I could be whatever I wanted to be, like my mom told me when I was little, that I'm going to be a penguin. That's right, a penguin. Now, I know what you must be thinking, that it would be a difficult task to morph from an undergraduate Sociology major to an animal that waddles and lives in the North Pole, but I've had stranger aspirations, so this is just another on the list.

When I was freshman, I was a business major and we had a class called Introduction to Business where we learned business ethics and murals, as well as tips on how to dress appropriately for business functions. If I were a penguin, I can guarantee that I wouldn't have to worry about the difference between business casual and business formal, because I would be wearing a tuxedo all of the time. Who wouldn't conduct business with someone wearing a tux all of the time? It's like you're dressed for negotiations around the clock.

Not only would I not have to worry about getting dressed for success, I would also have a career set out for me. I would spend my days wandering around the arctic, sliding around on my belly, looking for fish, and well, that's pretty much all I would do with my days, come to think of it. Maybe it is more interesting to attend classes now and be able to stand around the water cooler later than it would be to have to look for fish all day. Besides, I don't really like the taste of fish, so that might cause some problems down the line.

If you have read some of my other columns, you know that I have a large emphasis on school spirit and giving back to the University by participation in activities. As a penguin, not only would I come back as an alumnus to lecture undergrads about the advantages of going abroad, but I would surely have to comment that if the students hated the cold that is Massachusetts weather, the arctic makes it seem like a tropical paradise by comparison.

Since I have seen various animals occupying the space in front of Stockbridge Hall numerous times throughout the year, I don't think a penguin lecturing students would be so far fetched. And hey, maybe then I could get a doctorate in Marine Biology or Animal Husbandry, which might come in handy in the North Pole.

While I would clearly take this idea and run with it, sadly, I cannot become a penguin after graduation or any time for that matter. I have to face the question of what I want to be when I grow up sans changing into anything besides a graduate with a Sociology degree. Grad school is looking rather good at the moment, and then I can take more time and more student loans to figure out what I really want to be without stepping foot in the real world. I am rather sure I'm not alone in these plans, considering that so many people have no idea what they want to do with their lives.

It is a good dream to be a penguin and with reincarnation, I might be able to fulfill it in my next life. Until then, I'm going to continue going to classes, spend my last year here attempting to get into grad schools and looking longingly at the snow to think what might have been. Anyone else want to go slide around on your belly while figuring out what to do in life?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

BOYCOTT CAUSES MISSED OPPORTUNITY

I would like to comment on Thursday's class boycott from the perspective of a faculty member who has not signed the unfortunately named "non-penalty" petition. The activism and initiative shown by our students in support of the GEO cause is laudable, and the cause certainly worthwhile. It is a real pleasure to work alongside students who are so deeply and actively engaged. I do not agree, however, with the medium of a class boycott.

Class time provides students and instructors an opportunity to put their heads together and consider broad scientific, social, cultural and political issues that we all face. I personally consider that time extremely valuable, and do not think it should be squandered for a political cause, however just.

To suggest that instructors might "penalize" students for a class boycott is to miss the point — penalties will emerge instead in the form of missed opportunity.

BOYCOTT PROVIDES STUDENTS WITH A VOICE

In your editorial "Class Boycott not a Good Step Toward Change," you suggest that GEO should have looked to other methods of addressing its concerns regarding UMass' unfair proposals regarding wages, healthcare, childcare and benefits for same-sex couples. It is worth noting here that every week for the last 58 weeks, GEO has sat down in discussion with representatives of Chancellor Lombardi's office to talk about our grievances and try to find a fair and equitable middle ground. Throughout these 14 months of discussions, the university has refused to accept any contract that does not result in cuts to real wages and increased fees. Graduate students are not being heard in discussion, so we have to be heard in action.

Although your editorial claimed that no alternatives have been planned, in fact GEO, Take Back UMass and the Massachusetts' Society of Professors have planned an incredible event including numerous faculty speakers and the nationally known author Barbara Ehrenreich, author of "Nickled and Dimed." This event, which also includes a barbeque and live music, will be an educational experience for all. This alternative to class has been publicized with further details about the purpose and nature of the walkout/boycott on fliers and on the GEO website at www.geouaw.org. This action is not an excuse to skip class, it is an opportunity to learn, discuss and to be heard.

By walking out, we are not denying UMass students their education. We are demanding a fair, equitable and accessible education for all. This walkout/boycott is not just about graduate student wages, but also about everyone's ability to afford to study here at UMass. The larger UMass community recognizes the need for this event, which is evident in the fact that more than 200 faculty members have signed a statement of support. By going to class, we pretend that the assault on student and employee rights isn't happening; we continue to act normally and do what's expected of us. By not going to class, we resist and say we won't fulfill UMass' expectation until they start to fulfill our expectations for a fair labor contract, for student autonomy and for support for diversity.

GRADUATE REACTION ABOUT IDEOLOGY

The University of Massachusetts has a wonderful opportunity to not only improve its graduate programs, but also the living standards of the graduate employees who do a significant portion of its teaching and research. But it is squandering this opportunity.

The UMass budget is looking better now than it has in quite some time due to steadily rising state allocations, increased tuition and new policy which allows it to retain the tuition money it collects on campus. And if either the House Ways and Means budget or Governor's FY06 budget passes (both low-end budgets), UMass-Amherst's income from both state allocations and tuition/fees combined will still be 25 percent higher in 2005-2006 than it was in 2001-2002. In terms of the economic package it offers its graduate employees, UMass Amherst currently ranks sixth out of a list of seven of its self-identified academic peers. Yet, instead of using the improvements to its budget to rectify this situation, UMass has signaled a willingness to let its vital graduate programs rot. Right now, in its contract negotiations with its graduate employees, UMass, in conjunction with the Governor's Office, has proposed a reduction in child-care benefits, a wage package that doesn't even keep up with the rate of inflation and a massive increase to the cost of health insurance.

And in a move that clearly signals how UMass has become an arm of the Romney agenda, it is now proposing to eliminate benefits for un-married, same-sex couples at the university. Despite the legalization of gay marriage in the Bay State, many Massachusetts employers who previously offered health benefits to same-sex couples opted to retain those benefits as is, according to an article in the Aug. 22, 2004 edition of the Boston Globe. But not UMass.

The University's proposals to cut its graduate teachers and researchers aren't based on a financial reality, but on an ideology coming from the Governor's Office: an ideology that is anti-gay and anti-union.

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, APRIL 22, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

BY PATRICK RENNICK & DAVE FONSECA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For most, the advent of spring is all about young love, sunbathing and baseball. But for fans of extreme music in the northeast, the gentle entrance of spring is engulfed by the infernal call of the annual New England Metal and Hardcore Fest. For the next three days, fans of all things heavy will make their pilgrimage to the Palladium to witness a plethora of metal and hardcore acts in a yearly offering of sonic rage, unleashed upon the city of Worcester.

This year's lineup marks a further progression in the festival's diversity. What started seven years ago as a predominantly metal show, has over the years become a diverse venue, displaying multiple genres of extreme music. The 2005 lineup is sure to serve some jarring shifts between acts. Saturday will see Flower Metal vets Sonata Arctica rub up against Canada's most psychotic purveyors of pure aural torment Strapping Young Lad. While on Sunday, Egypt Obsessed Death Metallers Nile will set the stage for the legendary master of falsetto King Diamond. On that very same day, Poland's Behemoth will unleash its cult-influenced brand of blackened death metal just before North Carolina's Between the Buried and Me dazzle crowds with their seamless fusion of jazz and progressive hardcore. For the open minded metal fan, varied lineup choices such as these make Metal Fest a real treat.

Fans of more traditional acts need not despair, as this year's festival also features the return of some classic acts. Attendees of the festival will witness both the return of Floridian Death Metal godfathers Obituary and the reunion of Canadian crazies Cryptopsy. In a shocking turn of events, Cryptopsy's original vocalist Lord Worm has decided to return to the band after taking a break from his job as a kindergarten teacher, ready to dish out sonic pure metal fury to eager fans.

As has been seen before in the past, this year's event will continue to cater to the tight-knit Massachusetts hardcore community. Local Acts, Since the Flood, The Red Chord, All That Remains and Unearth will all take spots on the main stage while, Blood Has Been Shed, The Acacia Strain and Hell Within will all see time on the second stage.

Other Headliners include the Swedish triple threat of Hypocrisy, Soilwork and Dark Tranquillity. Fans of experimental grind-metal will be pleased to find Colorado's Cephalic Carnage headlining the second stage on Sunday with their incomprehensibly complex style.

One band that many are sure to have their eye on is the Canadian metal sextet 3 Inches of Blood. Showcasing an intriguing style reminiscent of the fantasy metal of the 80's and some flourishes of hardcore, many attendees are likely to be intrigued by this band, featuring the dual vocal assault of power-metal influenced Cam Pipes-and screamer Jamie Hooper. The band will be performing Sunday on the main stage.

Saturday evening will be reason enough for some die-hard fans to attend this year's event. In an unforeseen reunion former Misfits front man, Glenn Danzig will be performing with another former Misfits member, Doyle. While this appearance will most likely draw fans of both the artists individual efforts, many are eager to here the two perform some classic Misfits covers.

For lovers of the underground, the New England Metal and Hardcore festival continues to be can't miss show. Friday, Saturday and Sunday are chock full of legendary and cutting edge bands. If you're looking for a balanced attack of metal and hardcore, look no further than the Worcester Palladium this weekend to satisfy your appetite.

Students put colleges in copyright war over file-sharing

BY JOEL CURRIER
ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Universities are finding themselves trapped at the center of a bitter battle over bandwidth, caught between the entertainment industry's crusade to end copyright piracy and tech-savvy students' casual sharing of songs and movies.

The competing interests converged at a Digital Expo at Washington University, bringing together representatives from entertainment and technology with seven companies that market "peer-to-peer" file-sharing networks to colleges. The goal of the vendor fair and panel discussion Thursday night was to educate students about legal alternatives to trading copyrighted materials.

"I don't want to pay to download songs. If I really like something, I'll just buy the CD," said Scott Abrahams, 19, of Northbrook, Ill., a sophomore who estimated that he has collected thousands of digital music files on his computer, a playlist long enough to run for two weeks nonstop.

Students said the perception is that there's little risk of getting caught downloading copyrighted music and movies (they call it "ripping" or "burning") online. Some said they would be more willing to pay if their schools made it cheap and convenient.

"If (the university) were to sponsor something, I think it would make it more of an approachable option for us," said senior Jeffrey Dorr, 21, a senior pre-medical student from Miami.

That's what some schools, including Washington University and the University of Missouri at Columbia, are doing. They seek to weed out illegal sharing by arranging deals with a bevy of new digital wholesalers licensed to provide libraries of digital music and movies to colleges.

Recording and film industry representatives at Thursday's event said they embrace innovation and encourage technology companies to pursue legal alternatives to Internet piracy.

Technology has changed the entertainment business model by forcing it to cater to changing consumer demands for digital music, said Mark P. McKenna, a St. Louis University law professor representing the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco digital rights group.

As a result, universities face the challenge of balancing academic freedom against a duty to police digital piracy on campus, explained Rebecca Brown, Washington University's associate general counsel.

Several large institutions, such as the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, Pennsylvania State University, Purdue University and the University of Maryland, recently partnered with file-sharing companies to provide students legal access to digital media.

On March 29, the U.S. Supreme Court heard arguments in the closely watched Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios Inc. v. Grokster Ltd. case, a test of whether copyright holders can sue digital file-sharing networks that allow people to freely download and distribute songs and movies. A ruling is expected this summer.

iWork makes design affordable

BY MIKE WENDLAND
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

Sooner or later, every computer owner gets the urge to make something slick. And that takes us to desktop publishing and graphic design software.

Today, I have two programs to suggest, representing both ends of the design application extremes.

At the lower end ($79) is Apple's new Pages program, part of its iWork application suite that also includes Keynote, Apple's answer to the ubiquitous Microsoft PowerPoint presentation program.

After first being blase about Pages, I am now ga ga over it. The more I use it, the more blown away I am by its elegance. Alas, it only works with Apple computers, but with all the people who have been switching to the Mac platform recently, we need to talk about it.

At the higher end of the design software category ($699) is Adobe InDesign CS. It's not for the everyday user. But this program is so powerful you could design a slick magazine, a book or an album cover. It's used by commercial designers and comes in PC and Mac versions.

In between and above these programs are lots of older, perhaps better- known products, Microsoft Publisher ($130), Broderbund's Print Shop ($50), Corel Ventura ($699) and QuarkXPress ($999), to name the best known. But better known doesn't necessarily mean better. Pages and InDesign are generating lots of buzz at the expense of their long-in-the-tooth rivals.

Let's start with Pages. It's clean, crisp, very flexible and so easy to use you don't even need to read the instructions. Style is what sets Pages apart. It comes with about 40 design templates that cover everything from invitations to newsletters, brochures, press releases and school or business reports.

I'll use Pages for my annual family Christmas letter and for that alone, I'd pay the $79. You can drag pictures and images onto it, resize them and place them by using your mouse to pull or push the corners to the proper perspective. Just one click inserts tables and charts or changes colors and font styles.

Probably the neatest thing about Pages is how you can import and export it into Microsoft Word or the popular PDF format used to make an image of the page that can easily be sent by e-mail.

I've played around with most of the other design software over the years, and Pages beats them all in ease of operation and the sheer beauty of its output. It's immediately usable by kids and even computer-challenged adults.

That's not the same for InDesign CS. You'll definitely need the instruction manual to be able to start using this program.

But InDesign is not targeting consumers. It's for professional designers or heavy business users. You could pretty much design this entire newspaper with InDesign.

If you've used Adobe's other big-league graphics programs, Photoshop or Illustrator, you'll feel at home in InDesign. Forget templates. You create from scratch here, using things like a story editor, layers, transparencies and measurement and style palettes.

What makes InDesign so neat is its advanced typographical controls that let you create truly professional-looking typefaces. There are a lot of plug-ins that add extra creative controls, but since it would take pretty much an entire column to explain each InDesign feature, suffice it to say that there's a big learning curve.

It's worth it. If your business or organization wants to do desktop publishing for annual reports, catalogues, advertising or booklets, InDesign is the tool. For the rest of us, there's Pages.

Either way, we're talking about software that makes it possible to create documents so stunning you'd think they came from a big-time agency.

Mofro masters southern style

BY CAREY ZRGOURAS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Mofro's second release, "Lochloosa," from Swampland Records, continues the self-proclaimed front-porch soul of their 2001 debut, "Blackwater." The band is comprised of JJ Grey, Daryl Hance and a series of visiting musicians who each add their own touch to this saucy fusion of bluegrass, funk, rock, and the blues.

Mofro 'Lochloosa' Swampland

The band lists their favorite albums and influences on their official website, which include Otis Redding's "Good to Me" live from the Whiskey-A-Go-Go and live albums from Bill Withers and Donny Hathaway. Also found on their website is a recipe for some Blackberry Cobbler, and this is exactly what personifies Mofro and their music. This group of musicians strives for nothing more than creating an homage to their roots and to the place that they have lived their entire lives. This album stems from the homesickness the band experiences while away on tour, and perhaps one of the best things about it is the lack of pretension. Honest and simple, these creative instrumentalists and storytellers are more concerned with soul than anything else, and it is their consistent passion that makes this record worthwhile.

The title track alone could stand as a microcosm for what Mofro is all about. There are no complex lyrics, and the band has no pressing need to prove their versatility by crossing genres because although they do, it never feels forced. Rather, they choose simple storytelling and an honest sound without being boring. One can picture these boys jamming outside of their house, and this particular track is named after a local lake in their hometown. These images, which show the pride and passion from which Mofro stems their music, dominate the album. Lines such as "All we need is one more damn developer tearing her heart out" show their anger at the modern-day destruction of the place where they grew up and their passion for nature. They are possessive of the inspiration which reflects into their music.

"Dirtfloorracka" shifts to a funk-influenced vibe that can simultaneously invoke the repressed dancer in all of us and be a track to just relax to. The southern twang and attitude of this track give this album the edge it needs so that every song is different enough to keep the listener interested.

The lyrics of "The Wrong Side" are a great example of JJ Grey's storytelling abilities. The song speaks of his inability to let go of the past, and how he still looks back to lost time though he knows it's gone forever. At first it sounds cliche, but although JJ Grey is an adult he speaks from the perspective of a teenager on the wrong side of the tracks and the words are constructed to seem like someone who is still connected to the confusion of youth.

"Ten Thousand Islands" slows things down and highlights their blues influences. The combination of smooth slide guitar sounds and the reverberating harmonica mostly flows along, but is also interrupted by periods of heavier rock. This song also continues the pattern of songs on this album that can be for either throwing a barbecue or just laying down.

Throughout "Lochloosa," Mofro master southern style and attitude without being corny, and this is the type of record that can be played the entire way through, because it never loses touch with the laid back grooves containing deeper meaning. A nice mixture of slower ballads and up-tempo guitar infused tunes will keep the listener engaged. Mofro have proven their consistency of passion and soul, yet have not remained stagnant in their musical development thus far. There is honesty and pride in the things they write about in these songs, and the music has edge and personality while maintaining a simple feel, as well. Their commitment to feeling rather than showing that they can regurgitate the influences of others sets them apart, and leaves listeners wondering where they'll take it next.

Colleges fight copyright war

Technology companies fear that a ruling for the studios could stifle innovations, such as digital television recorders and music players. In the past, lower courts have said that technology companies cannot be held liable for how customers use their products, even if it's illegal.

Those decisions relied on a 1984 Supreme Court ruling in the case of Sony Corp. v. Universal City Studios, the "Betamax case," in which the court rejected the studios' attempt to block the sale of the home video player/recorder.

"In the dorms, you've got kids who love music, kids who understand technology on a regular basis and kids who have access to high bandwidth," said Jonathan Whitehead, 37, a Washington lawyer representing the Recording Industry Association of America. "It's sort of like a perfect storm."

It is no coincidence, Whitehead said, that the industry has seen a 22 percent drop in record sales since the file-sharing program Napster hit the market in 1999.

Research suggests that fee-based digital downloading is growing in popularity. A survey released last month by the Pew Internet & American Life Project said about 36 million Americans, an estimated 27 percent of all Internet users, have downloaded music or video files. The survey also showed that the percentage of Internet users who have paid to download music has increased by 4 percent since January.

A one-month survey released in February by the consumer research firm Ipsos-Insight said nearly half of American downloaders 12 years and older, or 24 million Americans, had paid to download music.

So far, at least 45 colleges and universities have signed deals with file-sharing companies. By subscribing, students benefit from discounted rates and don't have to worry about breaking the law. Schools save money on the cost of bandwidth, the speed of data traveling over the Internet, by storing digital content on campus computer servers. Schools also save time otherwise spent investigating complaints from the record and film industries.

Companies represented at Thursday's fair were Ruckus Network, Cdigix, Movielink, Apple, Napster, Soniswap and Peer Impact.

Washington University students approached the school's administration about finding legal downloading alternatives after a popular campus file-sharing program was shut down in February last year. That spurred an overnight protest and a spontaneous early morning rock concert outside a campus residence hall. Since then, students have turned to a slew of other file-sharing programs on campus, said Margaret Bauer, 21, a junior from Florissant and editor in chief of Student Life, the student newspaper.

Unless students can get music cheaply and conveniently, Bauer said, there's little incentive to pay because they don't expect to get caught.

"I feel like if it's easier to do it illegally, then they'll do it that way," Bauer said. "It's just another bill to pay each month and that's a pain."

The file-sharing programs vary slightly, but most charge monthly fees for unlimited access to millions of songs and movies from major producers. Some schools pass on the cost by including subscriptions in their fees. Washington University and Mizzou say they are exploring both options.

"It's so hard to go from not paying to paying," said Ben Rapaport, 20, a Washington University sophomore from Scars-dale, N.Y., who has collected about 8,000 songs on his computer.

Illegal file sharing at Mizzou spiraled "so out of control," said Beth Chancellor, director of telecommunications there. She said campus piracy has waned since April 2003, the month that record and film industries filed a combined 400 official copyright complaints against Mizzou students. The university plans to have a commercial file-sharing service in place by fall.

Students at Northern Illinois University, in DeKalb, Ill., have tested a file-sharing service from Ruckus Network since the fall, said Cindy Phillips, director of customer support services. Phil-lips said students enjoy watching movies on their dorm-room computers but will have little incentive to pay for digital music once the trial period ends next month.

St. Louis University and Southern Illinois University Edwardsville are not yet in the market, but the University of Missouri at St. Louis is considering it, officials said.

The University of Illinois is waiting to see which file-sharing services survive legal and commercial tests before subscribing to one for the school's 55,000 networked computers, said Mike Corn, the university's director of security services and information privacy.

"We watch this constantly. This is not one of those issues that's going away," Corn said. "If we guess wrong, we can't afford to lose a lot of money."

Whoever the Supreme Court says is responsible in the showdown between entertainment and technology, universities will likely try to keep tempo with a culture of digital dichards high on bandwidth.

"I don't think they'll ever be able to get rid of file sharing," said John Klaesmann, 20, a Washington University sophomore from Augusta, Ga. "They'll never be able to shut it down."

Laid-back soul and unique storytelling give alt-country group Mofro an edge in southern rock. Their second album, "Lochloosa" draws influence from Otis Redding among other notable artists.

UMass looks for win

came back from five goals down to defeat Hobart College last Saturday, 14-12, in front of a rabid opposing crowd.

Pacing the Minutemen has been the play of Sean Morris and Jack Reid, who are both on the Tewaaraton Trophy watch, an award indicating the best lacrosse player in the nation.

Morris leads the team in goals (27) and assists (16), while Reid has shut out four of the last six players he has gone up against.

The Hoyas, however, have two players of their own in search for this honor, with midfielder Andy Corno and defender Brodie Merrill still on the list. Corno recently became the only player in Georgetown history to get 500 groundballs; his six against Loyola last weekend put him at 501.

Merrill won the ECAC defensive player of the week award for his performance in the Hoyas 7-4 victory over the Greyhounds. Cannella is not sure where Georgetown will use its star defender, but knows he is useful anywhere on the field.

"He's great between the lines and on the wings and face-offs and creating havoc wherever he is on the field," Cannella said. "He's done very well in the midfield, so they may plan him there. If they play him down on Sean, I'm sure he'll create a lot of havoc too. He's a heck of a player, one of the best in the country."

Also pacing the Hoyas has been the play of brothers Pete and Brendan Cannon. Brendan, a freshman attack man, was named the ECAC Rookie of the Week this week for his two-goal performance against Loyola. Pete also contributed two goals in the game.

The Cannons have combined for 15 goals on the year.

Georgetown has 25 players with at least one point this season, illustrating Cannella's biggest concern, that the Hoyas have a lot of good athletes. Cannella sees Georgetown as a talent-laden team and hopes that the Minutemen do not let the opposition dictate the flow of the game.

"What you worry about is letting Georgetown's athletes take over, they have tremendous athletes and they run very well," Cannella said. "This is an explosive team from top to bottom. From their goalie defense, to their midfield, to their attack, so that is what worries you."

Tomorrow's game will be the second to last home game of the season for the Minutemen, with their last coming against Syracuse on April 30. Cannella sees the importance of playing at home, but feels it is more important for his seniors.

"Anytime you get a chance to play at home it's a great thing, especially for the seniors, where this is one of the last games they'll play at home," Cannella said. "It's good for those guys mostly."

Home stretch for UM softball

the A-10 and the ECAC Player of the week. She was also selected as the UMass/Dinn Brothers Co-Athlete of the Week, along with UMass men's lacrosse player Sean Morris.

While Kelley has produced all year out of the three-spot in the lineup, one of the biggest factors in UMass' recent strong play has been the contributions from the bottom half of the order.

The player who has stood out the most during the recent hot streak for the Minutewomen has been first baseman Amanda Morin.

Entering a doubleheader against Maine on Apr. 6, Morin was in a 2-for-46 slump and had a batting average under .100. The number-seven batter has since gone on a tear at the plate, as she brings a career-high eleven game hitting streak into this weekend's action.

During that stretch, Morin hit three home runs and raised her batting average to .255.

"She was struggling, but she made a lot of adjustments and worked hard at her game," Sortino said. "A lot of times hitters think they'll just break out of it, but she actually worked to bring herself out of it."

Batting one spot ahead of Morin in the lineup has been freshman left fielder Lauren Proctor, who has quietly had a terrific season from the sixth-spot in the order. She has led the league in batting for most of the year, and currently boasts the top batting average at .368.

Proctor is also in the top-10 in the league in on-base percentage, hits, RBIs and total bases, and will certainly be considered a strong candidate for A-10 Rookie of the Year.

"She's a good hitter," Sortino said. "People ask me if I'm surprised about her, but I knew she would be an impact player in our program. She's very strong offensively, she's got a good head on her shoulders and she has a passion to play softball that comes out."

Freshman Sarah Hurd and the UM softball team are slated to play in two doubleheaders this weekend. Hurd has a batting average of .233.

Miller is excited

The 34-year-old Miller had 12 points, winding up with 25,279 for 12th place in NBA career scoring.

"Now it's on to the playoffs

"We've got a chance. Obviously, we won't be at full strength, but who really cares?" Miller said after the game. "Everyone starts 0-0. Maybe we can get on another little hot streak like we were two weeks ago or something. We've got to find ways to win ball games."

O'Neal, who played only 43 games because of the suspension and a shoulder injury late in the season, averaged 24 points a game; Jackson, who played in just 50 games because of his suspension, averaged 18.7. Guard Ismail Tinsley averaged 15.4 but played in just 40 games with a variety of ailments and is still on the injured list with a bruised foot.

Injuries, illnesses and suspensions cost Indiana a combined 456 player-games, including 195 games by the five who were projected at the beginning of the season to be the starters, but ended up not playing a single game together.

"We needed to regroup," Jackson said. "I think we can go out there and play basketball."

This will be the third straight year the Pacers and Celtics have played in the opening round of the Eastern Conference playoffs.

Two years ago, Boston won the series 4 games to 2. Last year, Indiana swept the Celtics in the first round, beat Miami 4-2 in the second round and lost to Detroit 4-2 in the conference finals.

"We'll have to piece it together. Boston, to me, has been one of the surprise teams this year," said Pacers coach Rick Carlisle, a former Celtics teammate of Pacers president Larry Bird.

Men's lax set for war

HOWE from page 8

Washington's Retreat?

One thing is for sure, though — with these two rosters stacked with a ton of firepower, there won't be anything resembling the Burgoyne Surrender.

Since the 2005 NCAA Division I men's lacrosse schedule came out, tomorrow's game was immediately tabbed to be two of the best hours of lacrosse anyone would see all season long.

And the No. 3 Hoyas are finally here, in the Pioneer Valley, ready to shoot it out.

Both sides sport identical 8-2 records, but the Hoyas are a perfect 3-0 in the ECAC while the Minutemen are on their heels at 3-1, with a 6-5 slip-up at Loyola on March 26 as their only conference blemish.

In short, these two programs control their own destiny in terms of winning the ECAC championship, nothing out of the ordinary, as the last five conference titles have been owned by one of these two schools.

But UMass wore its only ECAC crown in 2002 during that stretch.

Georgetown has simply bulldogged its way through the conference over the past few years, and the Maroon and White have its chance to end the Hoya reign.

This game is huge.

It's not huge like UMass and Syracuse, one of the best lacrosse rivalries in the sport's history.

It's huge on a different level.

Tomorrow's game could potentially seal an NCAA tournament berth for the winner, and coupled with another hiccup before the end of the season, a loss could mean an early summer break and no opportunity for a free trip to Lincoln Financial Field in Philadelphia at the end of May for the national championship.

It's a safe bet to say these teams will be ready.

"Our guys, they better be excited," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "This is one of four games we have left, and if you're not excited for the No. 3 team in the nation coming into town, then you probably shouldn't be doing this."

Amen to that.

UMass needs to defend its turf, but the Hoyas are looking to conquer a new territory.

The two sides have mapped out their strategies. Georgetown will bring its pair of Cannons and a hidden Trapp, but the Minutemen will counter with a defense that is locked and loaded with a casing of Schells and the plan to make their enemy raise their White flag.

The battle of the new millennium is just hours away.

responded with a four-run rally of their own in the bottom of the sixth.

Sophomore second baseman Anthony Santos, who was 3-for-4 on the day, lead off the inning with a single, followed by sophomore first baseman Bill Rankin's single two batters later. Senior center fielder Jason Twomley walked to load the bases for senior left fielder Curt Szado, who was hit by a pitch to walk in Santos.

Adamski drove in Rankin and put two in scoring position when he was thrown out at first by the second baseman. Freshman catcher Bryan Garrity responded with a two-run single to right gap to put the Minutemen within one run.

"I've expected [Garrity] to be a good player and he's the kind of guy who wants to be in that situation," Stone said of his catcher. "He plays hard all the time regardless of the situation and he's always battling. He's a competitor and he's proven that."

Delaney's two-run homerun put Boston College ahead by three, but the Maroon and White started a last chance rally in the ninth.

Pinch hitter freshman Andy Tuetken made the most of his only at-bat by putting a lead-off line drive double off the top of the Monster. After another Santos single, Tuetken scored on Rankin's groundout to third before Twomley struck out to end the game.

"We were a little slow getting started offensively, but we showed character coming back and hit the ball to get it to 6-5," Stone said. "We got to keep us closer and it's a struggle when we struggle to get people out."

BC pitcher Nick Asselin went 6.1 innings with allowing a hit until the UMass rally.

half like they play in the first," Bolduc said. "For the most part they kind of start it but they have to play like they do in the first half and finish."

Turnovers and missed shots have plagued the inexperienced Minutewomen all year, but their numbers have steadily improved throughout the season as the underclassmen have seen more and more action. The team seems to remain confident going into their next game regardless of what happened in the last.

"We feel confident, attitude and morale is up, girls continue to work hard," Bolduc said. "We're seeing good things from leaders that we haven't seen so I think we'll see some good things this weekend."

UMass, Georgetown fight for top

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

In most cases, when the first place team in the conference plays the second place team, it's considered a pretty big game. However, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella won't tell you that.

Cannella sees tomorrow's home game against No. 3 Georgetown (8-2 3-0 ECAC) as another test challenging his team's consistency. However, with a victory over the Hoyas, the No. 9 Minutemen (8-2 3-1 ECAC) would move into sole-possession of first place in the ECAC with only one conference game left to play, a 1 p.m. match up with Rutgers on May 7.

The Maroon and White will host the Hoyas at Garber Field at 1 p.m. tomorrow and will return to action on Tuesday, when it faces the Crimson of Harvard in Cambridge.

Although Georgetown boasts the No. 13 scoring defense in the country (7.60 goals per game) and has won four out of the last five ECAC titles (with the Minutemen winning one in 2002) Cannella is confident that the best preparation is to approach each game the same.

"We can't prepare differently or play differently than we have in the past, if we do that, then we'll be in a lot of trouble," Cannella said.

Perhaps staying consistent is exactly what the Minutemen need. Since March 26, when UMass dropped a 6-5 game to ECAC opponent Loyola, the Maroon and White have won three in a row over conference opponents.

The Minutemen dominated Penn State (18-8 on April 2) and St. John's (14-6 on April 9) and Senior Jeff Zywicki and the UMass lacrosse team will look to take control of the ECAC as they play Georgetown tomorrow at Garber Field. Zywicki has accumulated 24 goals and five assists in 10 starts this season.

"Gorilla" warfare

Jeff Howe

In colonial America, when this country was trying to fight for its independence from the British, hand-selected groups of the most elite soldiers were often called into duty in times of great importance.

Able to be "ready in a minute's notice," these highly trained groups of militia were aptly known as the Minutemen.

Now, the No. 9 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, the newest version of Minutemen who reside right here in Amherst, have been given much more than just 60 seconds to prepare for their next opponent, the Georgetown Hoyas.

But to any Gorilla fan, the Battle at Garber Field on April 23, 2005 might just stack up to the Battle of Lexington and Concord just 230 years ago on April 19, 1775.

UM seeks A-10 win

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team has a big weekend of games, beginning with today's important doubleheader at Saint Bonaventure beginning at 3 p.m. On Sunday, the Minutewomen will host a doubleheader against North Carolina State at noon.

The games with Saint Bonaventure (10-15 6-0 Atlantic 10) are especially important, as the Bonnies are currently in second place in the A-10 and one spot ahead of UMass (22-12 7-3 A-10).

A sweep today would give UMass a shot at extending its streak of 10 straight A-10 regular season championships. UMass is two games behind first place Fordham (26-12 8-0 A-10) with only four conference decisions left after today. While Saint Bonaventure should be a tough opponent, UMass comes into today's contests with a great deal of confidence. The Minutewomen have won 11 of their last 12 games, and have never lost to the Bonnies, leading the all-time series 35-0.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino plans on keeping things simple against Saint Bonaventure and expects the results to favor the Minutewomen if they execute. "These are very big games," Sortino said. "We're looking to pitch well, hit well and field well. If we do that, we'll be fine."

After battling with A-10 foe Saint Bonaventure, UMass will face the Wolfpack (36-22) on Sunday if the rain in the forecast holds off. This marks the first regular season home game for UMass against an Atlantic Coast Conference opponent. This is also the first meeting ever between the teams.

This match-up is unusual for the Minutewomen because they typically do not face teams from the southern region after the first month of the season, but Sortino feels these games against a top opponent will be a good barometer for how good her team is.

"I think they're a strong team," Sortino said. "It'll be good competition from another region. It'll be good for us to get away from our conference and the region. It's a good predictor for us in terms of how we stack up against other regions. It's a good opportunity to see them this late because normally we don't see a team like this until the NCAA Tournament."

One of the players Sortino will be looking to come up big this weekend is catcher KJ Kelley. Kelley broke the school's career home run record last week and raked in numerous honors in the wake of this achievement.

Kelley was named as both

Minutemen fall short to BC at Fenway

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

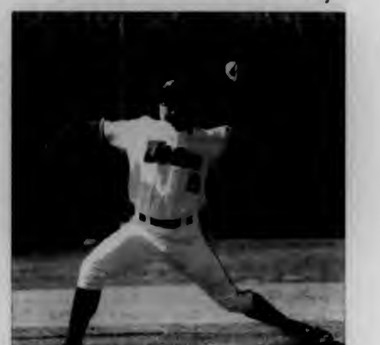
BOSTON — The players walked through the first base gate in awe as they stepped onto the biggest sports stage in New England, historic Fenway Park.

The Massachusetts baseball team battled from behind to come within one run of Boston College in the bottom of the sixth inning. However, UMass' comeback hopes were erased when senior left fielder Jason Delaney smacked a two-run home run over the Green Monster to secure an 8-6 victory for the Eagles.

The home run was Delaney's second career home run over the famous left field wall as he hit his first last season during the NEIBA all-star game.

The Minutemen next travel to White Plains, N.Y. to play Fordham in a three-game weekend series at Coffey Field.

"Everybody is going to be a little bit nervous when they play here," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "That's part of it, just getting used to playing when you are nervous is important, too. So hopefully, we can use this over to the weekend. We need to play well this weekend and get it done on the weekend."



After three hitless innings from both clubs and one UMass run, Boston College jumped out to a 4-1 lead in the top of the fourth. Center fielder Drew Locke broke the ice with an infield single to shortstop.

Following a pop out to shortstop, Delaney got an infield single of his own to put two on base. Catcher Shawn McGill drove in Locke with a single to tie the game and advance Delaney, who made to third on next at-bat on senior Mike Flynn's single to center.

With the bases loaded, designated hitter Ryne Reynoso was forced to walk to score Delaney and put the Eagles up 2-1. Second baseman Jonny Weiss then busted the game open, with a two-run single to center field for the third and fourth runs of the inning.

The Eagles tallied a run in the fifth and sixth to make the score 6-1, when the Minutemen

Rolle ready for draft

By Susan Miller Degnan
Knight Ridder

MIAMI — Antrel Rolle dashed around his apartment last week like a cornerback on a mission, unpacking this bag and packing that bag, throwing out spoiled food, sorting dirty laundry and putting away loose papers.

The previous day he arrived back in Miami after an all-night flight from San Francisco, courtesy of the 49ers. In three hours he would head to the airport for a flight to meet with the Detroit Lions. The next morning he would fly to Washington to meet the folks from the Redskins.

And then, Rolle said, the fun would begin.

"After that," Rolle said, "I'm chillin' and waiting for the draft."

Saturday, the University of Miami's former prize cornerback will be in New York, along with a few other projected first-rounders, as the NFL's guest for the opening day of the draft at the Jacob K. Javits Convention Center.

Rolle, who grew up in Homestead, Fla., said he is blessed not only because he stayed healthy after choosing to return for his senior year, but because he doesn't have to wonder whether an NFL team will choose him.

"It has been a great process, and in all honesty, it's a blessing being fortunate enough to be in this situation," Rolle said. "I'm worried about being a top 10 pick when other guys are worried about just being drafted, period."

Rolle is expected to be the top cornerback in Saturday's draft, though Adam "Pac-Man" Jones of West Virginia also is highly regarded. Rolle has a soft spot for his hometown team, but said he'll play hard wherever he lands.

"My dream day would be going as the first defensive player taken off the board and ending up with the Dolphins at No. 2 overall," Rolle said. "I'd love to play for Nick Saban. He seems like he's a technician, a perfectionist. That's the kind of coaching I've been used to, and that's the kind of coaching I think I need to continue to have — someone who doesn't let you slack, someone who wants perfection all the time."

But Rolle knows better.

"I only set expectations for myself when I know I can achieve them, when it's just me in control," Rolle said. "Titans? Redskins? Arizona? Miami? I don't know. I have no control over the draft and crazy, crazy things happen on that day. There can be trades all over the place.

"I'm just ready for some football, no matter who it's with."

Do or die time for Maroon and White

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (4-9 1-3 Atlantic 10) enters this weekend with its back against the wall. In order to make the A-10 tournament, they will have to win the rest of their Atlantic 10 match-ups including George Washington (11-3 4-1) on Sunday.

Before GW though, is a less meaningful, yet tough game against out of conference opponent Longwood (10-2) at 3 p.m. today at Garber Field.

At this point the opposing teams for the Minutewomen are irrelevant as every game is a must win and comes down to them playing their game the right way.

Last year UMass was on the ropes as well and came away with a three seed out of four teams in the A-10's by upsetting the number one seed Duquesne in its last A-10 game. This weekend, It's up to the upperclassmen to convince the nine freshmen that there is still hope and a reason to fight, which shouldn't be hard for the feisty youth.

"We have to win the next three games A-10-wise and it depends on how some of the other teams do as well," Coach Carrie Bolduc said. "It's still a little early to tell where we'll finish, but bottom line we have to win the three in order to be 4-3 on the season. We got to the A 10's last year being 4-3 and we beat the number one seed team, that's what got us there so it really depends what GW does."

Teams in do or die situations like UMass can either rise to the occasion with desperate play or pack it in and let the season slip away.

UMass is on a three game skid, while Friday's opponent, the Longwood Lancers, have won the last three. Even though a loss wouldn't mathematically end its season, it doesn't want to go into the biggest games of the year on a four game losing streak.

"They know [they can't lose], certainly the upperclassmen know based on last year and how everything fell down," Bolduc explained. "A lot of them had given a lot when we lost to GW last year in overtime by one, they thought it was over but they kept fighting and because of that big win against Duquesne the number one seed last year we were able to get in and ended up being number three, not number four."

There are a lot of combinations of wins and losses that would give the Minutewomen a post-season birth, but that isn't on their mind. What is on their mind is their growth as a team and what they have to do today in order to win.

"We have to finish. I think we were really close at Duquesne almost finishing and my team's just figuring out to start the second

Playoffs on the way

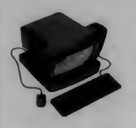
INDIANAPOLIS — Reggie Miller still has some unfinished business before he leaves basketball for good.

The Indiana Pacers threw a raucous, emotional retirement party for their all-everything player after his final regular-season game. But he still has the playoffs, starting Saturday at Boston, and one last chance to win a championship ring that has eluded him for 18 years.

It won't be easy.



A season that began with high expectations and a realistic chance for an NBA title crumbled that night in November when a Detroit fan hurled a cup of beer that landed on Ron Artest, who charged into the stands at The Palace and triggered a wild free-for-all. The Pacers won the game but lost Artest for the rest of the season.

Jermaine O'Neal and Stephen Jackson also drew lengthy suspensions for their roles in the brawl, and injuries began piling up as everyone else had to log more playing time. Still, with a seemingly rejuvenated Miller leading a late surge, the Pacers won 11 of their final 16 games and finished at 44-38 with Wednesday night's 85-83 victory over Chicago.

Lombardi's comment period has now ended

The public comment period for the University of Massachusetts community to respond to Chancellor John V. Lombardi's draft action plan ended on Friday.

After he receiving much negative feedback about his report on the commission's initial recommendations, Lombardi pushed back the public comment period. In a press release, he said a final campus plan will be posted on the commission's Web site April 29 that will include budgets and an implementation schedule.

Lombardi posted his initial report on the commission's Web site March 12, which drew immediate criticism from the UMass community. Then-Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante said that he was upset at the Chancellor for ignoring the commission's student affairs recommendations.

Bustamante made an alternative proposal in which he embraced all of the commissions initial recommendations that it made on March 1. Lombardi then posted the proposal on the commission's Web site.

Many groups on campus were upset at Lombardi's refusal to grant the commissions main reccomendation: to hire a new Vice Chancellor of Diversity.

At a UMass Faculty Senate meeting last month, Lombardi said that he would push back the public comment period. Over 100 people showed up to the meeting to voice their displeasure over the plan.

Earlier this month, Lombardi hosted a question-and-answer session online in which he addressed some of the student's criticism. He stood by his refusal to hire a vice chancellor.

Instead, Lombardi said that he plans to group together many student organizations into a new Center for Student Development. He would hire an Associate Vice Chancellor to run the center.

To pay for all these changes, Lombardi said that he would use campus funds for a Chancellor's Tax, which would cost $800,000. The tax would be made up of existing university funds.

All the mentioned documents can be viewed at the commission's Web site at www.umass.edu/campusdiversity.

Politicians focus on state crime lab repairs

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — In March 2004, police investigating the death of Christa Worthington took a DNA sample from her garbage man, Christopher McCowen, by swabbing the inside of his cheek.

It had been more than two years since her death, and police were taking a second look at about three dozen suspects with tenuous ties to the slain fashion writer.

It took several months for the sample to make its way to the State Police Crime Laboratory. Nine months after that, chemists there matched his DNA to that of Worthington's killer. On April 15, the 33-year-old McCowen was finally charged with murder, aggravated rape and armed assault. He pleaded innocent.

The slow pace of the DNA testing has drawn attention to a frequent complaint by the state's prosecutors: the crime lab is understaffed and underfunded and has had to closely ration how many DNA tests local law enforcement agencies are allowed to submit. Waiting nine months for results is not unusual.

"It is not a question of the science of the lab," said Cape & Islands District Attorney Michael O'Keefe, whose office is prosecuting McCowen. "The lab is excellent. The people there are dedicated. The issue is one of capacity."

Since McCowen's arrest, legislative leaders and the Romney administration have pledged to double the resources of what they say is a chronically underfund-

Arson destroys Alpha Tau Gamma garage

Two intentionally set fires around the University of Massachusetts campus kept firefighters busy and caused thousands of dollars worth of damage this past weekend.

The first fire resulted in the evacuation of Grayson Hall in the Orchard Hill Residential Area at midnight Friday after two trash cans were set on fire in a student lounge, says UMass spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski.

The second fire started around 2 a.m. in a garage behind a house at 118 Sunset Ave. causing $12,000 worth of damage. The house is owned by Alpha Tau Gamma, a fraternal organization for students of the UMass Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

There were no injuries in either incident, according to officials.

The Grayson Hall fire caused damage to the lounge walls and ceilings. All lounges in the building are now locked to prohibit student use, Blaguszewski said.

Amherst Fire Chief Keith E. Hoyle told the Springfield Republican that investigators determined the fire at the fraternity was intentionally set, although he did not give specifics. No arrests have been made and police are investigating the incident, he said.

One snowblower was destroyed in the garage. No vehicles were reported damaged.

The heat from the fire was so intense that it caused part of the house to catch fire 25 feet away. Firefighters had to tear through some of the walls on the third floor and portions of the roof to fight the flames.

The house sustained minimal damage. Once the fire had been extinguished, Amherst Building Inspector Bonnie Weeks was called to inspect the building after code violations were discovered inside.

The violations reportedly included blocked exits and renovations issues, which were not related to the fire. Residents were allowed back inside after the violations were corrected, Weeks said.

James Mulcahey of Providence, R.I., a 1960 Stockbridge graduate and treasurer for Alpha Tau Gamma Inc., told the Republican 12 active fraternity members live in the house.

Once located on fraternity row on North Pleasant Street, Alpha Tau Gamma relocated to Sunset Avenue after purchasing the property in January 2003. The fraternity has been renovating the house and making improvements, Mulcahey said.

The house has been home to several fraternities since the 1940s.

A different UMass fraternity, Delta Upsilon had its house burn to the ground on North Pleasant Street in October 2001 as a result of an unattended candle. Fire investigators determined several smoke detectors had been covered in plastic bags during that fire, which delayed notification to the Fire Department.

World famous magician performs for students

By Matthew Pilon
Collegian Correspondent

World renowned Christian magician Andre Kole and his team of magicians brought a unique act of faith-based illusion to the Campus Center auditorium Thursday evening.

Kole, who has been named Magical Inventor of the Decade, has performed in 76 countries and has collaborated with David Copperfield on over 100 stage and television illusions. Kole said that he has dedicated much of his career to debunking fraudulent claims of paranormal activity. He cited communication with the dead and psychic phenomena as examples of these false paranormal acts, giving a brief history of each.

Kole also researched psychic surgeons for Time magazine in 1973. In his book about his experiences, Miracles or Magic, Kole says he writes "Strictly from a magician's point of view, apart from the moral and ethical issues, watching these healers was fascinating. They performed their fake operations using some of the most clever sleight of hand that I have ever seen."

Kole told the audience a brief biography of his career in illusion. He said that at one point in his life he struggled to invent three new magical effects every day.

Dramatic fanfare blasted through the sound system as the lights dimmed. Kole appeared to materialize through an upward-facing industrial fan under a billowing red sheet. His illusions ranged from levitating five feet in the air to Pink Floyd's "On the Run" to making a 12 foot, several hundred pound replica of the statue of liberty disappear, recreating of one of his most famous illusions. The recorded voice of David Copperfield introduced the trick:

"My name is David Copperfield. In a moment you will witness one of the most remarkable illusions ever attempted on stage, anywhere in the world. Ladies and Gentlemen, Andre Kole."

Kole claimed to possess no supernatural powers and told the audience about an ongoing offer of $1 million to anyone who can perform a supernatural act that Kole cannot figure out.

Welfare Rights Union founder visits UMass

By Mishy Leiblum
Collegian Correspondent

Cheri Honkala, an organizer for poor people's rights, spoke in the Campus Center on Wednesday about her experiences with poverty and with political organizing.

Honkala founded the Kensington Welfare Rights Union (KWRU), one of the best-known poor people's organizations in the United States, in 1991. Based in Kensington, a "North Philadelphia neighborhood that is the poorest district in the state of Pennsylvania, the KWRU provides poor people with mutual support, a political voice, and the organizational means to participate in a movement for change. KWRU describes itself on its Web site as "a multiracial organization of, by and for poor and homeless people."

In her talk, Honkala described the moment that led her to become an activist, which took place while she was homeless and squatting with her 9-year-old son, Mark, in an abandoned house in Minneapolis, Minn.

"It was winter.The heating went off in the house," she said, "and I had to hold my son against my body to prevent him from freezing to death."

Honkala's narrative was peppered with jokes and half-jokes. At one point, she described herself as "very successful at civil disobedience."

"You have to be successful at getting into jail, and then successful at getting out," she said.

She also bragged about her two children, passing pictures of them to the audience. Honkala's son, Mark Webber, is a Hollywood actor who has had lead roles in the films "Snow Day" and "Winter Solstice." He continues the work of his mother, living simply while donating all the money earned from his films to the poor people's movement. He also twice successfully sued the city of Philadelphia for police brutality, in one case for being strip-searched and cavity-searched before a roomful of police officers when he was 13-years-old.

Describing some of the activities of the Kensington Welfare Rights Union, Honkala noted that it mobilized many people to attend marches and protests, such as the protests against the last two Republican Party nominating conventions. In addition, the KWRU runs "human rights houses" for victims of domestic violence and for people in the Education Abroad provides students with options

By Samantha Smith
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusettes Education Abroad Office in Hills put on a study abroad open house Wed. April 20 to welcome all students wishing to study overseas in the upcoming semesters.

The open house served very useful in providing an abundance of information regarding where students can go, what they can study, and the costs of each location. Many helpers were present to answer any specific questions students may have had, and to offer them cookies and a raffle to win $100 off their study abroad fees.

Assistant Director of Education Abroad, JoAnn Bernhard explained that the affordability of education overseas is "not as good as it used to be," saying that this was due to the cost of UMass increasing, and "the prices of studying abroad are geared toward UMass prices."

"There are also extra travel expenses which a student wouldn't normally have," Bernhard said.

Another factor which effects the costs, she said, is the value of the dollar, which seems to be decreasing more each year. Along with the decline of the dollar's value, Bernhard explained that "other countries are now understanding that studying abroad is a financial opportunity for them, so they're raising the prices."

Regardless of the prices, however, the experience itself seems worth whatever extra costs may apply, Bernhard says.

"[There are] a good variety of places to go," she said. "A student can go to any continent except Antarctica."

Along with having the opportunity to see a new country and experience a different culture, students can also fulfill UMass gen-ed requirements and classes for their majors or minors. Therefore, their time spent abroad will go towards graduating and getting a diploma.

Though the price may be an important factor, the programs are said to be only slightly more than the cost of UMass, and financial aid can cover the most fees.

"We send approximately 800 students abroad a year," Bernhard said. "If you include those who go in January and the summer, about 1,000 go."

Another program which Bernhard spoke positively about is the Student Exchange program held at UMass.

"We do more exchanges than most state universities do," she said. "It's a really important program because we are trading our students with students from other countries."

There were a good deal of students at the open house, showing interest in traveling to a variety of places. From Ghana to Egypt, China to France, everyone there seemed to want to go somewhere different. Freshman Clara DeNascimento showed a particular desire to go to France her junior year at UMass.

"I'll probably take French when I'm there, maybe some Global Education requirements," DeNascimento said. "Hopefully by then I'll have decided what I want to do and I can take classes for my major."

Overall, the Global Education open house proved to be extremely informative in an easygoing and friendly manner, and helped those who wanted to know more about what is involved with studying overseas.

last stages of AIDS, making up for the city's inadequate facilities.

She described the process that people go through when they want to become members.

"Whatever they need, we pull out all the stops to get it for them. It could be a single parent who needs the piping in their house fixed for $600, so that the Department of Human Services doesn't take their children away. We will find a way to get it fixed for them. In return, they commit to go through our political training, and to join one of the committees of KWRU, so they can give back to others, just as they have received."

The KWRU also sends representatives to international events like the World Social Forum, forging close ties with poor people's movements in other countries, such as the landless peasants' movements in Brazil and India.

"In today's world, you can't do anti-poverty work in the U.S. alone", she claimed.

Speaking about the connection between poverty and university issues, she stressed the importance of activism on college campuses to keep higher education affordable, singling out the Free Higher Education Campaign as a worthwhile target.

The founder of the Kensington Welfare Rights Union, Cheri Honkala holds a child while promoting her activist causes.

Besides her work with the Kensington Welfare Rights Union, Honkala also organizes with the Poor People's Economic Human Rights Campaign, which fights for the rights enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

"The Poor People's Economic Human Rights Campaign includes 100 organizations nationwide," she said. "It has groups from the Coalition of Immokalee Workers in Florida, to farmers in Kansas."

One of the main current activities of the Campaign is organizing truth commissions nationwide, modeled on the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of post-apartheid South Africa. This involves collecting testimonials from poor people about their experiences, and will culminate in a national Truth Commission this June.

The event was sponsored by the Student Center for Education, Research and Advocacy.

"No one has even passed the preliminary test yet," Kole said.

Kole also warned of the dangers of deception, alluding to politics in a subtle manner.

"When anything, no matter how absurd it is, is presented in a serious manner through a medium where honesty is presupposed, anyone can be deceived," he said.

Kole spoke of the miracles performed by Jesus, a topic he was challenged by Time magazine to investigate "as a magician and a skeptic." He said that his investigation changed his life, because he came to the conclusion that Jesus could have faked the miracles.

"Jesus did not have three tractor trailers full of magic equipment following him around the desert," Kole said.

Toward the end of the performance, preceding Kole's statue of liberty illusion, the audience was led through a short prayer in which Kole instructed those willing to "invite Jesus into your life."

Kole instructed the audience to question everything that they see.

The event was sponsored by the UMass chapter of Campus Crusade for Christ, an international organization advocating religious ideas of which Kole is a representative.

Quabbin Reservoir reaching capacity

BELCHERTOWN (AP) — Quabbin Reservoir is threatening to reach capacity for the first time in seven years, leading reservoir managers to release 150 million gallons a day over spillways to reduce the flooding risk.

The Northeast's largest reservoir reached more than 99 percent of its 412 billion gallon capacity over the past week, threatening to hit the 100 percent mark last reached in the spring of 1998.

The Quabbin provides drinking water to most of eastern Massachusetts as well as to South Hadley, Chicopee and Wilbraham in the west.

Because of its size, the Quabbin is both slow to draw down in time of drought and slow to fill up afterward, said William Pula, reservoir superintendent for the Massachusetts Department of Conservation and Recreation.

"If we did get a drought now, the reservoir probably wouldn't be in a drought condition for two years. We have three years worth of water supply in the reservoir," he said.

Pula said some of that history was revealed in late 2002 when the reservoir fell to 75 percent of capacity after a stretch of dry weather.

Impending deportee afraid for his life

BOSTON (AP) — Tears stream down Frank Enwonwu's face as he sits behind the glass barrier of a jailhouse visiting room and explains why a return to his native Nigeria would be a death sentence.

Immigration officials are intent on deporting Enwonwu, nearly two decades after he was arrested at Boston's Logan International Airport smuggling five ounces of heroin into the U.S.

Enwonwu, who says his crime was a "one-time mistake" born out of financial desperation, heads to court Wednesday in a last-ditch effort to block his deportation.

The 55-year-old father of three hopes to convince a federal judge that he is in danger of being jailed, tortured and killed if he is sent back to Nigeria.

"I'm not going to survive a day in Nigeria," Enwonwu said during an interview last Wednesday in a Boston jail.

His anguish turns to anger as he accuses the government of breaking a promise to let him stay in the U.S. in exchange for becoming a federal informant.

"I trusted them and they betrayed me," he said.

Federal authorities deny Enwonwu was promised asylum in exchange for his cooperation, which resulted in the convictions of at least three drug traffickers.

"The government's case boils down to this: He's a drug-smuggling criminal alien who should be deported," said Manny Van Pelt, spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Crime Lab suffering budget limitations

ed crime lab.

The lab is located in a former elementary school in Sudbury, with satellite offices in Agawam and Danvers. The lab does a wide range of forensics testing, including DNA, fingerprints and drug analysis.

The DNA lab itself occupies just 840 square feet, where a dozen chemists handle about 300 DNA tests per year. That's roughly one-sixth of the state's demand, according to lab director Carl Selavka.

Each month, the state's 11 district attorneys are allowed to submit up to four DNA samples, meaning investigators must prioritize cases and put DNA testing for less important cases on hold.

"All the DAs are ludicrously handicapped in the number of cases that they can present to the lab," said Geline Williams, executive director of the Massachusetts District Attorneys Association.

For the Worthington investigation, O'Keefe negotiated a special deal with the lab that allowed him to submit up to 10 samples per month, in addition to his district's regular allotment.

Until late last year, state officials had eased the lab's workload by farming out DNA samples taken from convicted felons to outside firms. The state monitored the work by randomly retesting one out of every 10 convict DNA samples, but the FBI decided that all outside DNA work had to be rechecked before the results could be sent to the FBI's Combined DNA Index System, The Boston Globe reported.

Karma in the United States

Todd Hanaburgh

I believe that there is some truth to the principle of karma, its effects touching all beings and collectives, including nations. The United States of America is no exception.

There are many histories in the world and likewise, many here in the USA. We have all heard the beautiful and idealized history fed to us in our youth. Who can deny that we were all lied to about Christopher Columbus when we were children? Who can deny the sidestepping action of most middle school teachers avoiding the fact that many heroes of the American Revolution were slave owners, and thus were not fighting for the freedom of all, but for the freedom of only some men?

We often forget the genocidal actions of our own government during the so-called Indian War, an active military campaign that lasted roughly 100 years and was followed by the systematic encampment and forced movement of hundreds of thousands of people.

A frenzy of nationalism broke out as the United States proclaimed a "Manifest Destiny" of extending her borders "from sea to shining sea." Through war, genocide, chance, opportunity and deceit we obtained our objective. Our nation was built on the backs of slaves treading upon stolen land. We are a nation founded by profit and materialism. That is the ugly side of U.S. history in a nutshell. This is what some may call an "alternative history," yet it is more accurate than the idealized history Americans are taught in primary and secondary schools across the nation. We must take the good with the bad in any effective introspective.

Both the United States and Canada had "Internment Camps" where citizens of Japanese origin were sent during WWII, their Constitutional Rights abridged and rescinded with no reparations made. White Americans, to draw another WWII parallel, have also mistreated black Americans in the South.

The victors of any battle are the ones who write history. They spin it to serve their interests. Our nation is no different. If we admit our wrongs, then we must also be held accountable, and accountability is not easy to live with. Therefore, some things must be swept under the rug. But karma is not so easily avoided; for every action there must be an equal and opposite reaction, and to maintain balance, energy is neither created nor destroyed. Karma keeps working whether we admit our wrongs or not.

The victors of any battle are the ones who write history. They spin it to serve their interests. Our nation is no different. If we admit our wrongs, then we must also be held accountable, and accountability is not easy to live with.

This leaves us in a very difficult position. It is not always easy to do the right thing. It is not always easy to discern what the right thing is. For example, it is too late to give the land back to the Native Americans, we can't go back to our proper homelands, we cannot raise the dead, nor can we turn back time. There is no possible repayment for the wrongs we as a nation have inflicted upon our own people, much less the rest of the world. However, we may start to improve the future by becoming more conscious and careful of our actions.

Reverend Doctor Martin Luther King Jr. said, "We must rapidly begin to shift from a thing-oriented society to a person-oriented society. When machines and computers, profit motives and property rights are considered more important than people, the giant triplets of racism, materialism and militarism are incapable of being conquered."

It is this very issue that is at the core of our problems as a nation today. We value things more than people, we outsource good jobs in the name of profit and we force children, in Indonesia for example, to labor 15 hours per day manufacturing whatever's hot on eBay. We get up in the morning, we go to work (where most of us produce nothing of use), and we get home to watch T.V. and program our minds. We invade nations over rumors or lies; we bomb buildings and make terror so that we can feel safer at home. As of this moment, we deserve everything we have coming to us.

Devotion sours without return

Becky Martins

Is there ever a point when someone appears "too available?"

I have previously made points about the behavior of the average college guy. I spoke from experience, labeling some "boys" as indifferent to anything non-physical. But today though, I stand by my original thoughts. I have had a small change of heart. Sure, many young men may not have their priorities straight and steer clear of everything remotely emotional. However, I now also realize certain females seem to make up for the male gender's lack of sentiment and ruin their own chances of feeling something meaningful.

Too much of anything can be a bad thing. Rarely does something good come of excess. If something is abused, typically, only negative consequences follow. Essentially all of these ideas can be applied to many aspects of life. But in this case, when using the word "availability," I speak of one specifically: the way we come across to others.

There are those people who build hypothetical walls around themselves to disallow the chance of anyone getting close. Rarely do they take chances in regards to expressing emotion.

Consequently, it becomes hard to get close and figure such personalities out.

Then there are those who wear their "heart on their sleeve." Often enough, they are overenthusiastic about whatever situation comes their way. Too soon and all at once, this type of person throws him or herself at another, expecting nothing but good things in return. But the truth of the matter is this is hardly the case.

Too often, it is these individuals who end up feeling hurt when reality does not match their expectations. Such people lose faith in others and generalize that everyone is the same: unresponsive and uncaring. They feel as if they were slapped in the face when the good deeds they once performed are not paid back to them when needed. Sadly, though, it is not an easy task to change one's natural ways. For this reason, it is all too common for such behavior to rear its ugly head time and time again.

We all know people who come on too strong. It may be a friend, who expects attention at all points of the day. We cannot forget that certain individual who would do anything for anyone, yet is rarely met with equal treatment. Then there is the person who never seems to have good luck with his or her love life. We eventually find ourselves less sympathetic toward this individual as we begin to see his or her situation more clearly. Maybe the world is not simply filled with bad people who enjoy inflicting emotional pain on others. Instead, it is also possible certain people simply set themselves up for future hurt.

Maybe the world is not simply filled with bad people who enjoy inflicting emotional pain on others. instead, it is also possible certain people simply set themselves up for future hurt.

It would be a lie to say this is a gender-specific problem. Personally, I have come across a number of guys who are always "head over heels" about someone, yet the interest is never returned. In reality, however, I would say females are more apt to follow this common trend of "over-availability."

Too often I see girls who are quick to make excuses for any type of poor treatment from men due to the intensity of their feelings. They are willing to do anything at any time for guys who would surely never return the favor. Some even believe any attention is better than none and allow themselves to be treated with no respect. It is sad how some people can lower their personal standards enough to justify such behavior. But I guess some people are either blind or indifferent to the way they come across to others and do not see the problem.

It is time people get a handle on their actions. Sure, it is easy when you like someone to get over-enthusiastic about things, but there reaches a point when enough is enough. If a line is crossed, the door only succeeds in making him or herself looks desperate, or worse, pathetic. Like many times before, he or she is left hurt, confused at why another situation turned sour. But the reality of the situation is, without learning from past mistakes nothing will change.

Women as well as men must realize their own self-worth and understand the negative effects of being "too available." Nothing good will ever last if we continue to make the same errors, just with different people. Instead, we must understand everyone deserves to be happy and should not justify poor treatment with excuses. For if we do, we are just as guilty — of cheating ourselves.

Andrew Freeman

One of the things that's surprised me since I started writing for the Collegian is how widely read this paper is. Thanks to the miracle of the Internet, I can read screeds from as far away as Georgia or Virginia that are posted as feedback after my columns. Whether it's an anti-left comment declaring I have no moral authority, or an anti-liberal rant urging me to study finance, I have found these comments insightful.

Today's column, as you may have guessed, is about addressing some of the misconceptions about this seemingly monolithic body we know as "The Left." Political conservatives have been waging a war of words against this institution, and almost invariably the rhetoric contains the following elements.

A typical posting declares that the Left dominates the media and academia, that it is unpatriotic, that it is opposed to America's values and that it supports the terrorists, among other charges. Next, "straw men," or individuals with ideologies that are portrayed as extreme, are trotted out to buttress these denunciations of liberals. If you ever wonder why John C. Conservative rants ad infinitum about George Soros or Michael Moore, it's because he views them as easy targets. Finally, because conservatives have been in power in recent years, they declare that liberals have no new ideas or platforms, and that the liberal agenda is a failure because they haven't won control of the government.

Before I discuss these further, let me say that some on the Left engage in the same behavior. When I collected money for MASSpirg several summers ago, the sheet that I read to raise funds emphasized conservative straw men such as Pat Robertson. Still, the volume of conservative vitriol is several orders of magnitude higher than that of its liberal counterpart. There is no liberal counterpart to Fox News, and there is only one liberal talk radio station, Air America, compared to the many conservative ones.

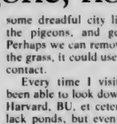
To dispute a few common charges, the media and academia are not fundamentally concerned with politics, so allegations of bias are misleading.

Universities and media corporations are focused primarily on survival, expansion and political adventures. In colleges, most classes have few if any political overtones — how many management or biology teachers will be criticizing the Bush administration rather than teaching their subjects?

Furthermore, journalists are often very trusting; Howard Kurtz of the Washington Post wrote nearly a year ago that his paper downplayed stories that contradicted the government's claims that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

Secondly, it is foolish and misleading to portray liberals as a monolithic movement, with one common agenda. If anything, the problem is that the political left is too divided at the moment over such fissures as the conflict in Iraq and what course to take to reclaim power, while the political right has fallen into lockstep behind the leadership of the Republican Party. President Bush has not vetoed a single piece of legislation— such has been his dominance of Congress and the legislative agenda. But the Democrats have been scattered in their reaction: most supported the war resolutions and appropriations, some supported his tax cuts; even Ted Kennedy famously collaborated with Bush on the No Child Left Behind Act.

Lastly, many liberals do have ideas for improving the country but they are largely moot since the Republicans control Congress and would prevent their implementation. As for the origins of such control, people vote for a candidate for many reasons and it would be folly to assume that all of them believed in the supremacy of the conservative worldview; indeed, most Americans display a profound lack of knowledge on politics. For example, a Harris poll in October of 2004 found that 41 percent of Americans believed that Saddam Hussein helped the hijackers carry out 9/11.



I think much of the bile thrown at liberals is there to affirm conservatives' identities. In the realm of politics, it is not enough for some to be in favor of a platform — you have to be opposed, stridently, to another ideology, and with it a group of people. You have to feel persecuted by that group for your identity to shine, to really mean something. That group takes on gargantuan proportions — it controls everything — you are hounded at every turn, the entire culture is arrayed against you. This philosophy transforms mere political identity into a central component of the Christian religious tradition: martyrdom.

This is not a realistic way to view the world — it encourages extremism, hatred and ultimately, violence — and everyone, liberal and conservative, should avoid it.

The swans are gone, now what?

World Perspectives

Gilad Skolnick

It's been difficult being away from my friends and university for a whole year studying thousands of miles from UMass at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. But the hardest part has been being away from UMass' pride and joy, its symbol of greatness: the trumpeter swans of UMass. I am still in a state of shock, more befuddled than ever before, since that day when I was told of the sad news on an IM saying, "they're going to go, a part of UMass is being given up." I cried, I sobbed and I yelled. I denied, but alas I came to a realization that I was powerless in the matter.

It was March 22 when it was made public that the swans were being deported to the Livingston Ripley Waterfowl Sanctuary in the sketchy town of Litchfield, Conn. Life has not been the same since.

This goes without a doubt as UMass' biggest mistake thus far, and I shall plea with all those who are in power to think a bit more deeply about such a dangerous and inappropriate move. The swans are not just floating pieces of fowl, but inspiring symbols of overcoming hardship and struggle. I remember those cold winter days when I knew I couldn't make it to that 9 a.m. class in the cold freezing Amherst weather, but then I thought, if those two swans can brave the elements then who am I to hide inside? I'm sure we each remember our own individual swan moments, when the swans were there for us, and now where are we for them?

One swan has died, another gone MIA and is presumed dead by our state's leading swan expert and former politician William Bulger; letting their deaths go in vain would be terrible.

Running away from your problems is not a message that I am proud to see UMass push. I remember my first day of freshmen year, frightened and confused — the hordes of people, the massive intimidating library, the huge campus; I looked over from the Campus Center and saw the swans confidently eating some grass, and I knew that if they could make it at UMass, so could I. The physical plants excuses are terrible as well, needing "peace and quiet." Perhaps every UMass student who needs more "peace and quiet" should run away as well?

Where do we draw the line? I bet the squirrels could use a bit more quiet too, maybe we should ship them off to an animal sanctuary in some dreadful city like Litchfield, and maybe the pigeons, and geese and ducks as well. Perhaps we can remove the trees in UMass, and the grass, it could use less trampling and human contact.

Every time I visit another university, I've been able to look down at it, whether it is NYU, Harvard, BU, et cetera, for many such schools lack ponds, but even those that do have such, lack the essential part of any pond, its swans. Now UMass has plunged deep into the cesspool of misery that other such swan-less schools share.

One swan has died, another gone MIA, and is presumed dead by our state's leading swan expert and former politician William Bulger; letting their deaths go in vain would be terrible. They'd be turning over in their grave if they knew that their fellow comrades were giving up on a dream, a dream that man has had throughout the ages, of students and swans living together in an institute of higher learning, in peace.

I shall make weekly visits to the swans next year, for this cruel punishment of solitude from humans is enough to make the smartest of swans lose its sanity, and I hope you all do too. For the meantime, I suggest we each find our own inner swan, our inner courage, to help us get through this.

If the swans really need more quiet and are not willing to show any ounce of flexibility, perhaps a soundproof swan-housing unit could be erected. It could have a heated swan pool for those cold winter nights, possibly with some jet streams to help ease those tense neck muscles. Maybe even a grass dispenser and a CD of relaxing "pond sounds" to put them to sleep. I'm sure solutions can be found.

I was even more astonished that UMass claimed it couldn't take proper care of the swans, even though we have an entire Vet and Animal Science program. If there is one problem UMass should be equipped to handle, of all problems, it should be this.

It was Thomas Hood, the renowned 19th century poet who I'm sure you're all familiar with, who said it best when he wrote, "There's a double beauty whenever a swan swims on a lake with her double thereon." Now I ask you, where's the beauty?

Smith meets Stoppard

'Arcadia' suits Smith talent

By JARED DEMICK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Generally, theater tends to have a polarizing effect upon its audience. Due to its tenuous nature and immediacy of emotion, a performance either awakens something deep inside the audience or leaves them cold and antagonistic. Saturday night's performance of "Arcadia" at Smith College was a rare exception as it was a performance that one simultaneously liked and disliked. In more specific terms, it was a wonderful execution of a badly written play.

"Arcadia" is a relatively recent work from a giant of modern theater, Tom Stoppard, a playwright most famous for "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead," and the screenplay for "Shakespeare in Love." However, while Stoppard has a prestigious reputation in the world of theater, his work is often criticized as being slight and arcane. "Arcadia" is not exempt from this criticism as it name drops obscure allusion after obscure allusion. The play raises some very perplexing and pertinent questions such as how does one make sense of this chaotic world. However, the play ends up being nothing more than a convoluted intellectual puzzle that revels in its own cleverness.

Also, while many Stoppard plays are absolutely hilarious ("On the Razzle" immediately comes to mind), the comedy in "Arcadia" is tired. Imagine Samuel Beckett collaborating with a washed up vaudeville act on a play based off of random entries from the encyclopedia and you would have "Arcadia."

The play weaves together two plots that both happen in the manor of an aristocratic British family, one in 1809 and the other in the present day. The basic premise is that on this manor owned by the Coverly family, two scholars, Bernard Nightingale, a Byron expert, and Hannah Jarvis, a writer researching about the estate's garden, are investigating a couple of mysterious events that occurred in 1809. Indeed, the events that did happen in 1809 are worth investigating as deceit and intrigue collide to create a huge mess that hurts a lot of people.

The lady of the house, Lady Croom, is furious over the renovations of the estate and the lack of propriety of her guests. Her daughter, Thomasina, meanwhile, is vexing her tutor, Septimus Hodge, with theories that disprove Newtonian physics while Hodge himself is trying to cover up the fact that he has slept with a guest's wife. To top it all off, the flamboyant Lord Byron, a friend of Hodge's, is insulting and offending people left and right. Meanwhile, in the present day, Bernard wrongfully believes that he has discovered that Byron killed a guest in a duel. The play lets both plots come to their tangled ends and even throws in some long digressions on Chaos Theory.

While Stoppard's play is annoying in its inability to engage the audience emotionally, the cast and crew of this performance were spectacular and managed to give a shine to a dull script. The set was wonderful as it was attractive and authentic to the time period, but not distracting. The acting was impeccable as the cast was uniformly strong.

The actor Peter O'Toole once said, "dying is easy, comedy is hard", yet the cast made it all seem so effortless with their innate understanding of just how to draw a laugh. This was no easy feat considering the lack of material in the script. Particular standouts were Keith Boynton (Bernard), Nicholas Dahlman (Ezra Chater), and Meredith Badler (Thomasina) whose manic, energetic performances both enraptured and entertained the audience.

Also noteworthy was UMass's own Chamaio Cheyenne-Rindge (Septimus) who also has given great performances in UMass plays such as "All's Well That Ends Well" and "The Curse of the Starving Class." Mr Cheyenne-Rindge really accentuated his character's chronic irritability and deceitful nature with an intense, understated performance. The only critique of the presentation is the director's decision to have his characters speak with British accents. While this helped to give the play authenticity, it was done amatuerishly as they were bad, overly simplified imitations of British speakers.

All in all, the cast and crew made it a pleasure to sit through such an intolerable play and that is the highest compliment one can give. The ability to take a mediocre script and transform it into a pleasant show takes real talent and an ability to shrewdly correct defects. The cast and crew at Smith showed themselves to be true professionals and worthy additions into the world of theater.

Pearl Street gets 'funked' up with Granola Funk Express

By BRIAN DUFFEY

North Carolinian nomads and musical fusionists, Granola Funk Express, performed in Northampton Wednesday night and put on an impressive display before a large, energetic audience. These eclectic musicians were joined by U-Melt, who opened the show at Pearl Street Night Club.

U-Melt, native of New York City, describe their music as, "organic progressive groove." They have been together for about a year and a half and have done roughly two hundred shows from Maine to Alabama. When their set began, the crowd was small and the energy was weak.

Slowly the crowd began to grow and people began to dance. Their jammish, climactic pieces were catchy. Yet, their agreeable sound was not unlike many other groups that would classify themselves under the jam genre.

U-Melt will be returning to the Valley on May 12th, where they will headline a show at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Their album, "The Unbelievable Meltdown," is now available.

Granola Funk Express is a diverse musical group that originated in the woods of Florida at a Rainbow Gathering in 1994. The Granola Funk Express kitchen served free vegan food to those who attended these communal events. In addition to providing food, they established a theatre to supply various forms of entertainment. One form of entertainment included free-form poetry or rhyming that was commonly accompanied by a drum or beat box.

The Granola Funk crew would perform on street corners in cities all over America to earn enough money to travel to different Rainbow Gatherings, all the while improving their lyrical abilities.

Over time, the music became more serious and the group settled in Asheville, North Carolina in 1996. Granola Funk Express, whose members are all familiar with life on the road, began touring and earned underground notoriety primarily through word of mouth. Almost ten years later, the band continues to tour feverishly and create a wide array of music that is always unique and original.

Veteran GFE guitarist Josh Blake says that he still enjoys traveling the country, despite having three children and a partner back in Asheville.

"I love doing what I'm doing. The band is a vehicle to see the country and meet new people we're all travelers," Blake said.

Granola Funk associate, TopR, opened the second portion of the night's festivities. This Bay Area representative is a skilled freestyler whose words aren't quite as positive and optimistic as most of those performed by GFE.

"I'm a very pessimistic, dark person," he said. Despite the difference in the lyrical specifics, TopR says that he shares many of the same views as the members of GFE. His style and delivery is much more dramatic and angry than of the GFE emcees.

His performance was received warmly. His relentless energy left the crowd screaming. He was joined on stage by GFE wordsmith, Foul Mouth Jerk. The duo is currently working on a project titled "Vomit is the New Confetti," for the group Vice Squad. Foul Mouth explained that the album's content is self-explanatory, "drinking, fing, stealing, and gambling."
